and from the unions in terms of the impact that any of these incentives would have on existing plant facilities such as now exist in the Niagara Peninsula?

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: That's a matter we have been discussing with him all along. I think the honourable member is probably well aware, because of his particular interest in the industries in his particular riding, that the incentives being offered would not necessarily involve the creation of new jobs but could very well mean the relocation of existing jobs, and that is a concern of ours.

Secondly, something was suggested previously about a $60 billion investment. I think most members in this Legislature are aware of the fact that the $60 billion investment, or whatever the figure is that they have been throwing around, is not necessarily new plant construction. A very substantial amount of it is to be used on retooling and modernizing existing lines in order to produce the new automobiles required to meet the energy consumption regulations that are being imposed by governments at this time.

Mr. Laughren: It's still dollars and investment.

LONDON CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Premier, in the absence of the Attorney General.

Hon. Mr. Davis: As long as it's not a legal opinion.

Mr. Peterson: No, no. We don't even ask him for legal opinions any more, because they're no good.

Mr. Roy: That's right.

Mr. S. Smith: Or a policy of any kind.

Mr. Peterson: In view of the fact that the capital works budget of the city of London was submitted to the Ontario Municipal Board on January 14 for 11 specific proposals and only two have been approved, and in view of the fact that this is holding up construction and jobs and all sorts of things in London, would the Premier intervene or get involved to make sure that the OMB hurries up on that approval process?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, if the honourable member is asking me whether I or the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) endeavour to expedite some problems emanating from the city of London, I have never been reluctant to try to assist any member of the House in the determination of a constituency problem.

Mr. Nixon: The problem is with the OMB.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Certainly I'll take this up with the Attorney General.

Mr. Peterson: Supplementary: This obviously speaks to a much wider problem than just London's problem. This administrative tardiness is costing London in the order of $2,000 a day. To offer a specific suggestion, would the Premier consider sending some people from the Ministry of Treasury, Economics and Intergovernmental Affairs—now that they've scrapped every major program in the TEIGA portfolio, they must have a lot of people not doing anything—would he possibly consider sending them over to assist the OMB in working out these figures, getting back quick approvals and getting construction and jobs going again?

Mr. Nixon: Sounds reasonable.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Ruston: Darcy's withdrawing.

Mr. Conway: He is going to Hazeldean-March for a holiday.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I was interrupted, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: You were indeed.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would be delighted to confer with the Attorney General and determine to what extent communities other than London—I must confess that I know of several communities where their capital budgets have been approved and work is in progress. I will endeavour to find out if there are other communities besides London with this difficulty and so inform the honourable member.

Mr. Van Horne: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker: Could the Premier give us some indication of his priority system in the selection of the two out of the 11 projects? Given his dedication to a policy of local autonomy, could he indicate to us when he provides that answer what kind of priority criteria were used in selecting these two projects out of the 11?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would have thought the honourable member would be somewhat familiar with the activities of the Ontario Municipal Board. I don't make those determinations of priorities. They are, of course, made by the board. I don't direct the board in terms of what particular project from the City of London is approved or not approved—

Mr. Nixon: McKeough does, though.

Mr. Kerrio: Darcy does.

Mrs. Campbell: Darcy does.

Hon. Mr. Davis: That is what the OMB does and does quite well.

Mr. S. Smith: The Treasurer sends them a letter. Darcy says, "No parks, no—"

Mr. Breithaupt: "Dear Mr. Chairman—"

Hon. Mr. Davis: Certainly the Treasurer sets out general areas of concern. There's no question about that.

Mr. Van Horne: Why don't you just find out and get us an answer?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think one of our areas of concern, unlike the Leader of the Opposition, is some development in downtown Hamilton. He is more concerned about Toronto than London; I learned that the other day.

CHILD ABUSE

Mr. McClellan: I have a question for the Minister of Community and Social Services on the report of the Task Force on Child Abuse. The task force says in the opening sentence: "It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the present arrangement of services are not effective in protecting children from child abuse or violent death."

The minister challenged the truth of that statement in his own statement. I want to ask him whether he does not understand that that inevitable conclusion was based on evidence of the task force's own research report to the effect that the majority of children's aid societies in this province have no standards, no guidelines and no procedures for identifying and treating child abuse cases?

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, I think that if the honourable member recalls my comments, I was taking some exception with the generality and the sweeping nature of that opening statement. I do not disagree with the recommendations. In fact, although I have only very recently received a copy of the report myself and we and the committee were in some considerable rush to be able to table it before the House rose for the summer, my concern was that the opening sentence, in a careful reading of the recommendations, is not necessarily borne out or supported by those recommendations.

It does not make any exception for the fact that there are many children in the province of Ontario who have been and probably are being well served by the protection afforded by the children's aid societies. I just think that statement, as a blanket statement, would have been more accurate had it been qualified to suggest that it was true in some cases, but not as a blanket statement implying, as one might interpret it, that under no circumstances does the system provide protection.

I don't deny there are cases where there have been failures, but I also think the members opposite and I and everyone else who shares a concern in this area must recognize that although there can be and will be improvements in the system, there can never be a guarantee of a perfect system. Wherever human judgement is involved, even with the most complete and thorough guidelines, there will always be room for some error in human judgement, especially when that judgement relates to the anticipated acts or the interpretation of acts of other human beings. There is just no way that I know of to provide for a foolproof predictability in human behaviour.

Mr. McClellan: Supplementary: In view of the fact that the task force indicts the ministry's failure to properly supervise the work of children's aid societies, will the minister agree as a minimal response to implement the first two recommendations and bring forward guidelines and standards of service for children's aid societies, and present them to the social development committee by the time we begin hearings on the Child Welfare Act in September 1978?

Hon. Mr. Norton: I am not sure that is a realistic time frame.

Mr. McClellan: You've had since 1974.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I will indicate, if the honourable member can control his apoplexy for a moment—

Mr. M. Davidson: It's sincere concern, not apoplexy.

Hon. Mr. Norton: We share his sincere concern, if that's the case. I would like the honourable members to bear that in mind.

There have been many policy directives and memoranda go out to children's aid societies over a lengthy period of time indicating approaches and guidelines, if you wish, in dealing with cases of child protection. One of the things that have come to our attention is that in some instances it is questionable whether these have been circulated or whether in fact they have even been maintained in a file by some of the societies.

At the moment we have a group within the ministry working on a manual, using as a base, some of the material that has already been prepared. As I indicated in my statement in the House earlier, we are working on the development of guidelines. I cannot guarantee it at this point, because I think that as a social worker the member would understand that it is not always possible to develop full and complete guidelines within a very limited time frame. We are working on them, and I hope it will not be long before guidelines will be available; at least in the form of a compilation, in the form of a handbook of recommendations that can be referred to by the children's aid societies.

Mr. McClellan: You are in a fog. You are floating in a fog.

Mr. S. Smith: A supplementary: Can the minister explain how it is that between his predecessors and himself there could still be what is referred to on page eight as the ministry being "remiss in setting standards and monitoring their performance," "the fact that the unevenness of service has persisted and is so pervasive is most disturbing," and on page 13: "There exists a lack of consistent ministry guidelines for abuse investigation and disposition"?

I realize he has been minister a relatively short time, but how does he account for the fact that with child abuse having been with us for so long there still persists such a situation in Ontario? Have his predecessors not been on the job? Has there been a problem within the organization of the ministry? What has the minister done about it within the ministry? Has there been some upheaval? These are very serious indictments.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the honourable member realizes that I view these as very serious matters. I would agree that child abuse has been with us a long time; in fact, probably since the beginning of time or the beginning of man. Perhaps a more relevant time frame is the time at which a growing awareness of the rights of children has come about, and that may have been delayed in our society, or North American society, or western society generally. But the fact of the matter is that since that perception has grown, we in Ontario, as in other jurisdictions, have moved really quite quickly in terms of trying to come to grips with this problem.

In a more specific response to the Leader of the Opposition's query I have not yet had a chance, because of the very short period of time I have had the report, to evaluate or to review all of the background material that the task force had at its disposal, but I think part of that very problem may relate to the traditional organization of the children's aid societies in our province, in that they have been—

Mr. McClellan: No, it has to do with your ministry. You are responsible.

Hon. Mr. Norton: —established traditionally and historically as having a degree of autonomy that perhaps allowed for a limited amount of supervision.

Mrs. Campbell: Oh come on. You can't use that one.

Hon. Mr. Norton: As I have indicated in my statement, I believe now that it is time to review the role and perhaps seek some changes in the role of my ministry vis-à-vis children's aid societies in this province.

TOURISM

Mr. Eakins: Mr. Speaker, my question is of the Minister of Industry and Tourism.

Mrs. Campbell: He is leaving.

Mr. Conway: He is going back to the Premier's chair, where he was the other night.

Mr. Eakins: Has his ministry conducted any studies geared to reducing the provincial tourism deficit this year, similar to the study in British Columbia, where they have found that if just one resident in 10 who normally travels outside of BC could be convinced to stay at home the provincial deficit could be reduced by 30 per cent? Is the ministry undertaking any studies that would reveal similar findings in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: No, Mr. Speaker, we do not have such a study.

Mr. Eakins: Supplementary: Since British Columbia and Ontario together make up over half of the national travel deficit and yet BC is ahead of us by one year in attempting to reduce its deficit, has the minister been made aware of some of BC's more successful efforts, such as the Bonus Blitz in which the provincial government would purchase newspaper space in which members of the private sector in turn would submit discount coupons for their particular operations? If he is aware of these programs, would the minister consider such a measure before the summer season is upon us in Ontario?

[3:15]

Mr. Ruston: Tomorrow is the first day of summer.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: We are aware of some of the programs that are being started in the province of British Columbia. They have taken several steps. We have monitored what they have been doing. We have attempted to do some similar things to what they have done, but we have not embarked upon quite as expensive a program as they have.

Mr. Laughren: I don't think you are doing much over there.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: We have put a great deal of our money into the advertising budget as opposed to what they are doing in BC.

Mr. Martel: You are not doing much about the auto pact either. What are you doing?

Mr. Conway: They're sinking without the former minister. Bring back Bennett, buggy and all.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The member for Renfrew North is suffering from terminal dandruff.

OIL AND GAS PRICES

Mr. Deans: I have a question for the Minister of Energy related to his statement earlier today. I wonder if the minister could tell us, firstly, whether or not in the deliberations within his ministry he has taken into account that there will likely be a loss of approximately 4,300 jobs as a result of the increase that will take place this year in the price of petroleum-based products.

Secondly, has he done a calculation to determine whether or not there is in the inventory 107 days' supply, as opposed to the 60 days' supply in the period of grace that is permitted by the federal government? Since $23 million will, therefore, flow to the oil companies as a gift, will he consider extending the freeze period in the province of Ontario for at least the 107 days in order that we not further reduce the capacity of the province of Ontario to maintain its relative economic position both in terms of jobs and in terms of income?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Certainly we will do all we can to extend the freeze period beyond the 60 days that has now been agreed to.

Mr. Martel: Permanently.

Mr. Laughren: Do it.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: On the matter of the percentage of funds from the increase going to the industry itself, if the member opposite would look into that in some more detail he would find that only about half of the increase goes to the industry itself. A very big chunk of it goes to the government of Alberta and a smaller percentage goes to the federal government.

Mr. Conway: Loughheed will balkanize this country yet.

Mr. Deans: Supplementary: Does the minister believe it is within his competency, his power and his jurisdiction to extend the freeze unilaterally in the province of Ontario to the 107 days in terms of the impact of the increase? If he does believe that, what other course of action can he take in order to protect the consumers of the province of Ontario for the period of time during which there is an inventory sufficient to meet the needs of the Alberta producers?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: I frankly don't think—

Mr. Haggerty: You don't know.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: —that applying a unilateral freeze on price increases here in Ontario—

Mr. Deans: You can't apply it anywhere else.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: —and disregarding the increases that will be taking place outside is a solution at all. That is simply running away from the broader problem.

Ms. Gigantes: That's what you do all the time.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: That is just a Band-Aid approach.

Mr. Deans: What's your alternative?

Mr. Martel: Nothing.

NUCLEAR PLANT SAFETY

Mr. Sargent: I have a question for the Minister of Energy. In view of the very serious news story in this morning's Globe and Mail, headlined "Emergency Coolers for Atomic Units Can't Do Full Safety Job, Reports Say," which goes on to say that the Bruce plant is now shut down to 65 per cent power; and in view of our concern that the interorganizational working group for the past nine months did not volunteer to the royal commission on electric power planning the fact that it had discovered serious inadequacies in the emergency system design, I ask the minister if it is his concern that we can guarantee to the people of Ontario that criminal negligence charges will be laid against scientists or those in the nuclear program who withhold information from the public? Why can't we have a full disclosure of the whole situation?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: I certainly share the concern of the member opposite about the story that appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning. I think that probably every member in the House who read the story is equally concerned.

Ms. Gigantes: We were concerned two weeks ago and we were concerned two years ago.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Even though I have a very high regard for the Globe and Mail, and peddled it as a boy myself, and a regard for the reporter—

Mr. Cunningham: That is the best thing the minister ever peddled.

An hon. member: When the minister was a boy?

Mr. Conway: It must have been the Globe then.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: —I would like to say that I do not believe the story that appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning. Until such time as I can get evidence to prove something to the contrary, I will continue to believe what the chairman of the board of Ontario Hydro tells me and what the president of the Atomic Energy Control Board, Dr. Prince, tells me.

Ms. Gigantes: What did Dr. Prince say?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: And this morning, following my reading of that story in the Globe and Mail, I talked to both of those gentlemen. I asked them a very direct question and I wanted a direct answer.

I said, "Are you withholding anything? Is there a concern here? Is there something that I should be concerned about, or the people of Ontario?"

The chairman of the board of Ontario Hydro said, "Categorically, no. There is no room for concern." The president of the Atomic Energy Control Board said, "Look, if I was concerned about the safety, I would close those plants down or I would de-rate them. There is no reason for concern." Therefore, until such time as further evidence is available, I'm going on the assumption that, in fact, that story was erroneous in many of its aspects and that the information I got directly from the Atomic Energy Control Board and from Ontario Hydro is the correct information.

Mr. Sargent: A supplementary: Due to the fact that there are billions of dollars involved and that the lives of 10 million people in this province are involved—

Hon. B. Stephenson: We have only eight million.

Mr. Sargent: —eight million people, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. member: Not according to our OHIP files; we may have 11 million.

Mr. S. Smith: There are visitors here during the summer, Bette.

Mr. Sargent: —in view of the fact that the minister makes a very serious charge, and it says here, and I quote: "However, leaked documents indicate official worry about how Parliament and the public might react."

Mr. MacDonald: You were dismissing them last week, Eddie.

Mr. Sargent: The thing is that I would hope that the minister would get a full investigation, get the names of these people and get them on the carpet and find out what the hell's going on.

Mr. Hennessy: Atta boy, Ed. Go right ahead.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: I agree, Mr. Speaker. I would like to do precisely what the member opposite wants us to do and that is to find out what is going on; and that is precisely what we're doing right now. I can simply say in this House at this time that on the basis of the information that I've received from the Atomic Energy Control Board and from Ontario Hydro, that that report in the Globe and Mail this morning was largely—not entirely—

Mr. Deans: Ontario Hydro has not told the truth in 20 years.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: —erroneous and misleading and it is unfortunate it was written in the way it was.

Mr. Sargent: The minister had better back that up.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: The very fact that the scientists today are not in total agreement with each other about what constitutes adequate criteria for safety, is to me a sign of real assurance. If they are all complacent about safety and there was never an argument about it, then I think we should have cause to worry. But, really, it is most unfortunate that that report in the Globe and Mail this morning was written the way it was and I fully expect that after we hear more from Dr. Porter, after we have a statement from the Atomic Energy Control Board, which is forthcoming, that report will be largely disproven.

Ms. Gigantes: After a lot of unfortunate incidents.

Mr. Speaker: A final supplementary: the member for Carleton East.

Ms. Gigantes: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the minister if he is saying, in the light of Dr. Porter's letter in which he mentioned his concern that information relevant to the vital subject—and he was speaking of the safety of existing nuclear power plants—may not have been brought to our commission's attention by the responsible organizations and the other source—that this may be true, which is the Globe and Mail story, apparently confirmed by sources in the AECB, that there may, in fact, have been an attempt to "rewrite regulations in such a way that the existence of an escape clause on the safety requirement could be covered up"?

Is the minister satisfied to tell us that if information is being withheld he will sit tight and feel calm and we should all feel calm until the people who withheld the information come forward with the information? It's illogical and inconsistent, it seems to me.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Mr. Speaker, the member opposite has quoted from Dr. Porter's original letter to the Provincial Secretary for Resources Development. I expect on Thursday of this week the minister, my colleague, will be tabling Dr. Porter's further letter where he will elaborate on what he meant in the first one. I think when that letter comes, the honourable member will see the subject from a somewhat different point of view.

In the meantime I can only say, as I said earlier here, other statements will be coming out of the Atomic Energy Control Board and from Ontario—

Ms. Gigantes: When?

Hon. Mr. Baetz:—probably from Ontario Hydro to my ministry to make it very clear that there is no prevailing danger and as a matter of fact the standards set by Ontario Hydro for their own nuclear reactors were higher than those the Atomic Energy Control Board finally imposed and the level at which they licensed those stations to operate.

Ms. Gigantes: There was a mistake.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: There is at this point nothing—nothing—to indicate that there is any danger or that in fact we are compromising on our safety standards; there is nothing to that story whatever.

Ms. Gigantes: They are not rushing forward to confess.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Quit grandstanding until you get the facts.

Mr. J. Reed: I wonder if the minister is saying by his answer that really what is happening here is that the article represents another point of view regarding the same subject, or is he suggesting that the article is definitely erroneous? Because of the sensitive nature of this whole nuclear issue and because these stories elicit such a strong response and because they provoke such a deep concern among the people of Ontario—and rightly so—would the minister see to it that these articles are answered factually and concretely, so we know that we are dealing with either an erroneous statement or simply a divergence of viewpoint?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: It is our full intent to issue a statement coming from the Atomic Energy Control Board, possibly from our ministry, but a statement which will clarify the issues. There is no doubt that in this particular story there are differences in points of view and nobody argues with that. I think what has been unfortunate in this and earlier stories, but particularly in this one, is an innuendo, a suggestion, that there's something very clandestine and undercover going on here and that they are fooling around with the safety and the lives of the workers and the people of Ontario. We are determined to get to the bottom of that so people will know just what is what.

An hon. member: And you run them at 100 per cent capacity?

OHC SALARY AWARD

Mr. Bounsall: A question for the Minister of Housing Mr. Speaker: In the contract reached between Ontario Housing Corporation and the housing authority employees across Ontario, members of the OHC employees' union, CUPE Local 767—the nine per cent salary increase in the contract received as an arbitration award in December 1977, rolled back by the AIB to six per cent in February 1978 and that decision re-enforced upon appeal in April 1978, with that contract signed the day after April 4—why has that contract not been implemented and those employees paid, it now being almost two years since most of them have had an increase in salary and they have been working now without a contract for some 17½ months?

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Most members of the House will realize that CUPE 767 is in two divisions as far as the Ontario Housing Corporation is concerned. The first division is the employees who are gainfully employed here in the metropolitan area and the rest of the province is under a second contract.

Mr. Bounsall: I said across Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Very clearly and very carefully, the contract for one CUPE organization has been agreed to under the arbitration agreements and the points that were made by the arbitrator at the time.

On the second contract that went to arbitration the union did not agree, or could not come to a common understanding with the Ontario Housing Corporation, as to the interpretation of the order or report by the arbitrator. At this very moment, Mr. Speaker, that particular recommended settlement is back before the arbitrators for clarification.

[3:30]

Mr. Bounsall: Supplementary: That being the case, would the minister intervene personally, if he hasn't already, to ensure that the long-delayed contract is implemented without further delay so these workers will not continue to feel frustrated or in any way develop disincentive feelings about working at their maximum capability?

Hon. Mr. Bennett: I trust the union and the Ontario Housing Corporation will present their cases before the arbitrator. As minister,

I do not intend to interfere with the regular procedure of negotiating a contract.

Mr. Deans: It is taking a long time.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: That's your union fellows. Don't blame me. Sure, they drag their feet all the time.

SUPPLEMENTARY BUDGET

Mr. Conway: My question is to the Treasurer, Mr. Speaker. It deals with the Treasurer's supplementary budget of April 25, in which the Treasurer indicated very specifically that as part of his permanent reductions in expenditures to refinance the OHIP increase, one item involving a cut would be the Ministry of Northern Affairs' regional priorities program in the extent of $9 million.

I would like the Treasurer to indicate why it was that in mid-May the Minister of Northern Affairs (Mr. Bernier), who I believe did not at the time provide a full explanation of the situation which indicated that the intention of the supplementary budget was largely altered and that, in fact, the $9 million was not taken, as he indicated, from the regional priorities program in its entirety, although several millions were taken from other parts—why was that supplementary budget paper of April 25 altered? That is my first question.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I think that we could probably find several other changes—

Mr. Peterson: It's not very easy running backwards, is it?

Hon. Mr. McKeough:—and I think some changes, perhaps, are still being finalized. Ministries obviously had the option of going over the list. The dollar amounts didn't change; they looked at where best they could take the money from.

Mr. Conway: Well, supplementary to that; surely the Treasurer would appreciate that if the estimates process is going to mean anything—and I am sure there are many on that side of the House who would expect it not to mean very much in terms of financial accountability—it is surely the responsibility of the government, to the best of its ability, to indicate where those changes are going to be made and why. I would ask the Treasurer to indicate to this House, in the light of what he has just said, how much of that supplementary budget is in fact negotiable. How many of the other seven items are not going to be as they were presented to us on that occasion? Because surely if the Minister of Northern Affairs—

Mr. Speaker: The question has been asked.

Mr. Conway:—is free to change as he has, then others can be expected to do likewise.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I am sure the Minister of Northern Affairs would be delighted to answer the question during the course of his estimates.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, if I may, arising out of this situation in regard to the estimates.

Mr. Speaker: There is nothing out of order.

Mr. Ashe: The member is.

Mr. Conway: I rise, Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege. Surely it affects the privileges of all members of the House when we are presented on April 25 with a supplementary budget paper which we are now led to believe is not going to be proceeded with quite the way suggested at the time. I think the privileges of all members of the House are greatly affected by this haphazard, cavalier dismissal this afternoon by the Treasurer of his supplementary budget paper. I would invite the Treasurer—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Oh Sean, you're being silly.

Mr. Conway: I do not think—

Hon. Mr. Davis: His point is silly.

Mr. Conway:—I do not think that it is a silly matter, though the Premier may not agree with me.

Surely the privileges of all members of this House are directly affected when we are led to believe, as we were on April 25, that there was a supplementary budget which was going to make cuts in seven specific areas, and in fact we have evidence that we continue to vote moneys in ways that are not squared with that supplementary budget. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to consider the fact that the budget presented by the Treasurer at that time is not being proceeded with—

Mr. S. Smith: It was a political document.

Mr. Conway:—quite in the way we were led to believe. I would certainly invite the Treasurer to take the opportunity of one of the remaining days in the session to indicate what other changes are going to be made and why.

Mr. Roy: We are being misled around here.

Mr. S. Smith: It was a political document.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I am sure that at the conclusion of that statement, which I don't have in front of me—I think I brought it with me for some little time. Obviously, nearly two months later we are now getting the first question, which says something about the interest of the Liberal Party in these matters.

Hon. Mr. Davis: A slow day, a slow day.

Mr. Roy: You should talk.

Mr. S. Smith: Specific, and it turns out to be phoney.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I would simply say that I am sure at the end of that statement I indicated that I would be able to give more precise details as to where the reductions totally had been achieved and would do so, in any case, not later than the first quarterly finances, which I would expect we would be putting in the mail some time in July.

I am quite sure the ministers, as their estimates come up, can give up-to-date figures as to not only what changes might be made on April 25, but perhaps also other changes which might occur during the course of the year, either by way of underspending or overspending, handled by the possibility of supplementary estimates or, if the amount is small enough, by Management Board order.

Finally, addressing the point of privilege raised by the member for Renfrew North, I would just say that in my view it is not a point of privilege and what he needs is a good summer holiday.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Maybe a day camp.

Mr. Roy: The Treasurer is the one who needs a holiday more than anyone else.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I would like to address myself to that point of privilege, if I might. In regard to the point of privilege raised by the member for Renfrew North, two things occur. First of all, the questions were asked of the Minister of Northern Affairs as to how the budget cuts were going to affect his budget. He was not able to tell us during his estimates what programs were going to be cut down or by how much. I would agree with my friend from Renfrew North that we have been presented with a document by the Treasurer outlining the requirements of the province of Ontario, and at the whim of the various ministers these can be changed, and the document that we and the public at large, are supposed to follow, is nothing but a falsification of the actual requirements of the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Oh, get off it!
Interjections.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege: There is no falsification, and that should be withdrawn.

Mr. T. P. Reid: That was raised with the Minister of Northern Affairs—

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The member stands there trying to defend his inadequacy in the estimates—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Nonsense!

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask the member for Rainy River to withdraw any intimation that there was a falsification of anything.

Mr. T. P. Reid: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hennessy: It is about time.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Certainly the Treasurer and the Minister of Northern Affairs did not mean to mislead the House; it is simply incompetence.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: It's your incompetence that you don't know how to ask questions.

Hon. Mr. Bernier: If I could clarify the point, Mr. Speaker. I regret the memory of the member for Rainy River is that short. This particular point was discussed in detail during the course of the examination of my ministry's estimates when we talked about the $9-million cut.

Mr. Nixon: You didn't have any answers then either.

Hon. Mr. Bernier: I pointed out to the honourable member that $5 million was coming out of the community priority budget, $3 million out of the regional priority budget and $1 million out of the capital construction program for highways in northern Ontario. He knows that. It's on the record for him to look at.

Mr. T. P. Reid: That's not the point.

Hon. Mr. Bernier: It is on the record and if he checks the record he will find it is correct.

Mr. Speaker: I have come to the conclusion there is no prima facie case for a point of privilege.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Patrick, you must have been away that day.

Mr. Conway: Darcy will float out to the tune of the Hazeldean March.

REPORTS

STANDING SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT COMMITTEE

Mr. Van Horne, on behalf of Mr. Gaunt from the standing social development committee, presented the committee's report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bill with certain amendments:

Bill Pr18, An Act to revise the Hamilton Civic Hospitals Act, 1961-62.

STANDING ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE COMMITTEE

Mr. Philip from the standing administration of justice committee presented the committee's report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bill without amendment:

Bill Pr29, An Act to revive Poly Aire International Limited.

NUCLEAR PLANT SAFETY

Hon. Mr. Brunelle: Mr. Speaker, I am tabling a letter today that I have received from Dr. Arthur Porter, chairman of the Royal Commission on Electric Power Planning.

Dr. Porter's letter provides information on matters that were raised in his letter to me of June 9 last that related to the safety of nuclear power stations and to the viability of the Canadian nuclear industry which were subsequently raised in the House last week and again today.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

CITY OF HAZELDEAN-MARCH ACT

Hon. Mr. McKeough moved first reading of Bill 131, An Act to establish the City of Hazeldean-March.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH INSURANCE AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Peterson moved first reading of Bill 132, An Act to amend the Health Insurance Act, 1972.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Peterson: The purpose of the bill is to require a medical practitioner and a health facility to inform every patient of the cost of the medical services incurred by the patient and paid by the Ontario Health Insurance Plan.

It seems to me if we are going to provide some kind of "visible link" between the high cost of services and consumption on a patient basis, the first step we have to undertake is to inform the patient of the cost of the services consumed. That is the intention of this bill. I hope it receives a quick passage.

COUNTY OF LENNOX AND ADDINGTON ACT

Mr. Hennessy, on behalf of Mr. J. A. Taylor, moved first reading of Bill Pr27, An Act respecting the County of Lennox and Addington.

Motion agreed to.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Samis moved first reading of Bill 133, An Act to amend the Municipal Elections Act, 1977.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Samis: The purpose of this bill is to establish limits on the amount of contributions that can be made to the election campaign of municipal candidates. The bill requires that all contributions to a municipal candidate must be made by individual persons only. All contributions of $100 or greater are to be recorded and subsequently reported. The contributor is limited to a maximum contribution of $1,100 in an election year and $550 in any year that is not an election year.

INCOME TAX DISCOUNTERS REPEAL ACT

Mr. Walker moved first reading of Bill 134, An Act to repeal the Income Tax Discounters Act, 1977.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Walker: The bill repeals the Income Tax Discounters Act, 1977 because the act is no longer necessary by reason of paramount legislation brought in and introduced and passed by the Parliament of Canada.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON NOTICE PAPER

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I wish to table the answers to questions 37, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93 and 97 standing on the notice paper and call the 11th order. (See appendix, page 3721.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY

DISCRIMINATORY BUSINESS PRACTICES ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moved second reading of Bill 112, An Act to prohibit Discrimination in Business Relationships.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I just have a few brief observations to make. Actually, the intent of the bill, which was modified somewhat from the previous bill that was introduced, was stated upon its introduction.

The basic principle in this bill, I think, is quite clear. It relates to discrimination as it might affect people or citizens of this province in relationship to policy set outside this country. I think it is regrettable, and I've said this before in the House and publicly, that it was necessary for Ontario to bring in this kind of legislation. It would be far more properly done by the government of Canada.

We were not able to really use any existing legislation in other jurisdictions as the guideline for the bill that is before us, in that we were not able to go the route of economics or trade and commerce which would have been the appropriate approach, we believe, and properly done by the government of this country.

Of necessity and bearing in mind the extent of the constitutional limitations imposed upon us, we have established in this bill the principle of anti-discrimination. I think it's fair to state there are very few similar pieces of legislation, and we are particularly interested in the principle that this bill establishes.

I have received communication from one of the members opposite. I expect perhaps two or three others may, as they study this bill carefully, express certain concerns; although I sense in the letter from the member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) his support of the bill in principle, but outlining two or three areas of a technical and legal nature that he would like to raise—

Mr. Samis: Pretty fundamental.

Hon. Mr. Davis:—during the course of the discussion of the bill. I would make it quite clear to the members opposite that I have no objection, and the government has no objection, to consideration of some of the issues raised by the member for Riverdale. It is difficult in drafting legislation of this kind to anticipate the examples that could be developed, and that may be when this bill gets before committee.

My concern is that the principle of the bill remains intact. Certainly as far as I'm personally concerned, we would welcome either from members opposite or those who might appear before the committee any suggestions as to its improvement, or ways and means to see that in the pursuit of this principle and objective we are not contravening the rights of individuals within this province as well.

It is perhaps at first glance not that complicated a bill, but having lived with it now for several months I suggest to the members opposite that there are some implications here that I would hope all members are aware of and that we have an opportunity to discuss when this bill goes before committee. The principle is very simple. It is an expression, hopefully by this Legislature and by all members, of our opposition to a policy or policies created other than in our own country which has an impact of a discriminatory nature on citizens of this province. This is the intent and principle of this bill.

If some of the members opposite prior to, I would hope carrying of second reading in the next short period of time, have any basic concerns to which they wish me to reply, I'd be delighted to try but I would think that really detailed discussion would be much better served in the committee. I'm sure there will be ample opportunity for discussion there of some of the questions raised, particularly by the member for Riverdale who has communicated them to me.

Mr. Conway: Daniel Moynihan and Scoop Jackson would be so happy.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Is the member not going to vote for it?

Mr. Breithaupt: Mr. Speaker, the matter of this boycott situation first arose in January, 1977 upon the return of the Premier from a visit to Israel.

The headlines in the Toronto Star of January 22 were: "Firms That Boycott Israel To Lose Ontario Contracts." The body of the comment made there is as follows: "Ontario will refuse to give government business to companies which comply with the Arab boycott against Israel, Premier William Davis said yesterday." The Premier went on to be quoted as follows: "It is my intention to take certain steps to lessen the effect of the boycott in so far as firms over which Ontario has jurisdiction are concerned." That sir, was on January 22, almost exactly 17 months ago.

The next matter that came before the House in a formal way was the bill introduced during the spring session of 1977. This was Bill 39, introduced by the member for St. Andrew-St. Patrick (Mr. Grossman), since which he has joined the ministry. The bill was introduced on April 19, almost exactly 14 months ago. In that bill, the honourable member set out his particular concerns and attempted, through the means of the private members' system, to bring this matter before the House in a form not dissimilar from what we have with us today.

However, two weeks later, a provincial election was called. I recall it had something to do with rent review, that stays in my mind.

Hon. Mr. Davis: That's my recollection.

Mr. Roy: That was the excuse.

Mr. Breithaupt: In the event, of course, the election campaign saw several comments made during its time. One of which I have record, is a comment made by the Premier during an interview on Radio Noon with respect to the bill which had been introduced by the member for St. Andrew-St. Patrick. The Premier mentioned at that time that this bill was the only representation of any action by anyone in the province and he said, quite properly, that it should be a matter of national concern. My leader was particularly involved in this matter on two occasions during that election campaign; the first in a private way, one might say.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Is he speaking on it today?

Mr. Breithaupt: I expect so. The first, in a private concern, was made by addressing a letter to the Prime Minister of Canada; a letter dated May 31.

Mr. Roy: What is the Premier trying to suggest?

Hon. Mr. Davis: He said it was phoney.

Mr. Roy: He comes in here and speaks up.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: He is meeting with the press right now.

Mr. Roy: Don't be so phoney.

Mr. Breithaupt: My leader at this time commented as follows to the Prime Minister:

"Dear Mr. Prime Minister: In the interest of the civil liberties of all Canadians I am appealing to you for federal government legislation to discourage compliance with the Arab boycott. Experience in our country, the United States and elsewhere has proven that unless the federal government provides to all of its citizens a strong, governmentally-supported base from which to resist application of the boycott, such resistance will never be fully successful.

"The guidelines set up on January 21, 1977, are insufficient. Evidence has been presented by the Commission on Economic Coercion and Discrimination that the business community in Canada has complied with the boycott. This has occurred because the guidelines substantially narrowed the grounds upon which your own policy statement of October 21, 1976, could be applied. The guidelines have failed to combat Canadian corporate compliance with boycott provisions of both a restrictive trade and discriminatory nature.

"The United States experience with compulsory reporting of requests for compliance with the boycott resulted in almost 170,000 requests within the first year, October 1, 1975, to October 1, 1976. This was in connection with over 97,000 transactions involving $7.7 billion. Compliance with the requests was cited in over 90 per cent of the cases reported. This information indicates the very serious extent to which the boycott intrudes upon the normal functioning of the American economy.

"The Export Administration Act of 1965 expired on October 1, 1976. This act enunciated the principled opposition of the United States government to restrictive trade practices and boycotts furnished or imposed by foreign countries against other countries friendly to the United States. However, a reporting mechanism and other prohibitions against boycott compliance were maintained in anticipation of a new bill. I understand that anti-boycott legislation is now before the House of Representatives and the Senate and is expected to be signed imminently by President Carter.

"I have been informed by the trade commissioner in Damascus that he no longer requires a negative certificate of origin in all cases because the United States usually refused to meet this requirement in the past. Due to the tough stand that the United States government has taken, the impact of the boycott has been reduced and business in the United States has not suffered.

"I urge you, therefore, to enact legislation for Canada incorporating the following proposals: That the government prohibit itself and its agencies from assisting or supporting the boycott; that the government prohibit Canadian firms from complying with any foreign-imposed boycott directly against a country which is friendly to Canada; that the government prohibit Canadian firms from answering or complying with discriminatory boycott requests regarding the religious or ethnic character of their personnel; that the government prohibit Canadian banks from processing letters of credit containing boycott clauses; that Canadian firms be required to report receipt of boycott requests within 30 days, including an indication of the disposition of each request; and that the government require public disclosure of information concerning boycott activities in Canada.

"The boycott has a discriminatory impact upon Canadian citizens. By creating an invidious distinction between Canadians of different religious origins, it undermines the quality of Canadian citizenship and divides Canadians from other Canadians. It requires Canada to violate its own principle of non-discrimination in international trade. It demands that Canada forego its policy of balance and objectivity in foreign disputes and puts our resources at the disposal of one of the belligerents to the conflict.

"Compliance with the boycott constitutes taking a stand against Israel, which is in opposition to our stated foreign policy in the Middle East. Non-compliance is a refusal to take sides. The issue is not whether Canada is pro Israel or pro Arab, but is simply one of basic fairness. This is a time for strong nationhood for Canada. The boycott is a threat to our country's sovereignty. I urge you to immediately enact definitive legislation to ensure that the political, economic and moral character of our society is not in danger."

That letter was sent to the Prime Minister of Canada by my leader on May 31. It outlined the position which this party has taken throughout the involvement in this particular situation. The opportunity came forward several days later, on June 3, to re-emphasize our position in a speech which my leader made in north Toronto to a B'nai B'rith meeting.

I would quote just briefly from the comments, which were reinforced publicly at that time. "Specifically, I want to appeal today, in the interests of the civil liberties of all Canadians, for federal government legislation to discourage compliance with the Arab boycott, and to pledge that the Ontario government under my leadership would do everything within its power to encourage resistance of the boycott. Experience in our country, the United States and elsewhere has proven that unless the government provides to all of its citizens a strong, governmentally-supported base from which to resist application of the boycott, such resistance will be never fully successful.

"The guidelines set up by the federal government on January 21, 1977 are insufficient. Evidence has been presented by the Commission on Economic Coercion and Discrimination that the business community in Canada has complied with the boycott. The guidelines have failed to combat Canadian corporate compliance with boycott provisions of both a restrictive trade and discriminatory nature."

Further, my leader said: "The boycott has a discriminatory impact upon Canadian citizens. By creating an invidious distinction between Canadians of different religious origins, it undermines the quality of Canadian citizenship and divides Canadians. It requires Canada to violate its own principle of non-discrimination in international trade. It demands that Canada forego its policy of balance and objectivity in foreign disputes and puts our resources at the disposal of one of the belligerents to the conflict."

Those were two involvements which the leader of this party took during the time of the last general election campaign. Professor Irwin Cotler of Montreal served as chairman of the Commission of Economic Coercion and Discrimination. The findings, conclusions and recommendations of that commission have been publicized. We, as Liberal members of this Legislature, associate ourselves with them.

The legislation that should be enacted by the federal government had really to be meaningful in order that it might be effective. It should not, for example, simply be a re-statement of the federal guidelines, since those guidelines are deficient. They substantially narrowed the grounds upon which the October 21 policy statement could be applied. They certainly stated that federal government support and facilities would be denied to companies after boycott clauses had been signed; thus government support would be provided up until the actual time when the contracts were signed. Promotional services, market information and all facilities would continue, under the federal government's terms, to be made available for any transaction so long as the boycott clauses, known to be required, were not yet signed.

I believe that the absence of a serious reporting mechanism has been a significant undermining of the federal government's position. The application of the federal government's policy is limited and narrow. It will do nothing to compile general information on the boycott situation in Canada, or to substantially combat Canadian corporate compliance with boycott provision of both a restrictive trade and a discriminatory nature.

Professor Cotler concluded his report of the commission with the following remarks: "The issue at this point goes beyond the question of the protection of Canadian sovereignty, the affirmation of free trade and the protection of the civil liberties of our citizens, though this alone would be enough. The issue, in effect, goes beyond the question of the boycott. What is at stake now is the credibility of our commitments and the integrity of our policies. At some point we must say the sovereignty of this country is not for sale. In defining our policy on the Arab boycott, we are really making a statement of ourselves as a people."

When the Legislature returned in session after the election on June 9 last year, there was nothing further to be said on this subject by the government. On June 30, a question in the House from my leader to the Premier brought the following comments from the Premier: "We are pursuing it. It is a complex matter. It is one, obviously, that would be better dealt with, and more properly dealt with, by the government of Canada. I said that at the time and I repeat it now because I believe that to be fundamentally correct. However, Mr. Speaker, the matter is under consideration by the government."

Mr. Nixon: That answer was a year ago?

Mr. Breithaupt: Well, almost exactly a year ago as we go through the chronology of this matter.

Mr. Conway: The fullness of time.

Mr. Breithaupt: Finally, on December 16, Bill 129 was introduced. A government bill, at last, was on the order paper, almost a year after that excursion to Israel. It was at the very end of the session, where of course unfortunately it could not be dealt with further in a prompt fashion.

Hon. Mr. Davis: We still had hopes that the member's friends might do something.

Mr. Breithaupt: But Bill 129 was placed on the order paper of the House almost exactly six months ago. There was a general feeling that this was a good bill. Certain sections were worded in a way that might have shown some hasty draftsmanship, but the only fears the Jewish community had within Ontario particularly appeared to be that there might be a strong lobby by businesses which feared a loss of trade from the legislation, and that that would either delay the reintroduction of the bill or cause it to be substantially altered when the matter came before the House again.

Mr. Philip: They wouldn't dare.

Mr. Breithaupt: It should be noted, I would suggest, that the business community, in its response, was aware of the fact that during the time period, according to the findings of that Commission of Economic Coercion and Discrimination, there had been no substantial loss of trade as a result of resistance to the boycott, especially within the United States.

Basically, Bill 129, as it was brought before us six months ago, designated certain business practices as discriminatory and prohibited such practices. It also, of course, provided designated information about other persons, as well as negative certificates of origin, which were both prohibited at the same time.

As I have said, there was a feeling half a year ago that that bill as introduced was the prospect of good legislation. Now we have Bill 112, introduced to this House on June 8, 1978, almost exactly a year since the previous election and almost exactly 17 months since the Premier returned from Israel. It was known at that time that this session of the House would end just two weeks later, indeed a couple of days from now.

So here we are, in the last few days of this portion of the session before the expected adjournment on Friday of this week, considering the principle of this legislation.

In this overall situation, the federal government has clearly been inadequate in giving the necessary leadership in this matter. We therefore seem forced to follow the approach taken within the United States. After some 10 or more state legislators had introduced bills which were passed by their assemblies on their own, the federal government finally got its act together. We know that in Canada the only effective resolution of this matter will be with the commitment of Parliament to act. The American experience shows that a strong approach, a national approach, is the best policy and that it alone can work.

Yesterday, in the Toronto Star, there appeared an article by Mr. Ron Atkey which I would commend to all members of the House.

Mr. Conway: A fine fellow.

Mr. Breithaupt: I'll quote only a brief portion:

"... the principal fact that can no longer be disguised is that many Canadian firms, particularly large ones, are simply ignoring the policy. The reason for this is that the policy, without legislation, lacks teeth. The only sanction for non-compliance is the possibility of withdrawal of Canadian government services and financial assistance in performing a contract in the boycotting countries. Large Canadian or multinational firms don't usually require governmental assistance, so are free to comply with any boycott demands no matter how much they may discriminate against Canadians on the basis of racial or religious criteria."

Mr. Conway: Did you hear that, Sidney?

Mr. Breithaupt: In supporting this bill in principle, we do so recognizing that there are certain problems of drafting which will have to be considered in committee.

It is the intent of the legislation to avoid having foreign powers impose their views on our business organizations. However, we do have situations where our residents in Ontario may wish to gather together and encourage other residents not to buy certain products. It may be because the products may not have union labels, or they may have come from some nation whose internal social policies are abhorrent to the protesters.

If this legislation is to apply to these cases, then this may go beyond the resolution of the problem as suggested and perceived by the government and, indeed, I think, by the majority of the members of the House.

The Premier, in his introductory comments, mentioned a letter received from the honourable member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick), who had shared the correspondence with certain other members of the House. The member is not here but may be attending on the debate, and I dare say he will be able to place on record the comments in his letter, which set out quite explicitly those examples which I have briefly cited for the benefit of all the members of the House. I hope he will have the opportunity of placing the contents of this letter on the record of the House. I would not presume to do so, but if he is not able to speak perhaps one of his colleagues would be prepared to have that information provided to the House.

When this bill was introduced by the Premier on June 8, he mentioned in his statement certain comments which may also cause us concern as we deal with the bill at the committee stage. The comments dealt particularly with some legitimate concerns of the business community that would have to be addressed as the bill was drawn and developed, in order to achieve the attitude that we would wish to have.

As the Premier stated in his comments two weeks ago, the bill was tabled prior to the end of this session, and I quote: "... so as to give members of the business world and others who might be interested ample time to put forward constructive suggestions."

Indeed, we support the principle of this bill. As I have mentioned, the approach of the federal government has been most inadequate on this subject. A strong provincial decision may encourage an effective national approach. The committee hearings which will eventually deal with the particulars of this bill will, no doubt, bring forward other concerns in addition to the ones I've mentioned, raised by the member for Riverdale, and the comments by the Premier with respect to legitimate business concerns.

I commend the legislation, in principle, to the members of the House, and I can assure the members it will be supported on this side.

Mr. Lawlor: My colleague the member for Riverdale has done yeoman service in connection with this particular bill in terms not of its central principle but with respect to certain ramifications or side effects that flow from it, which I am sure weren't in the minds of the government when it was drafted and which require rectification. He cannot be here today and he asked me to say on his behalf that he desires—and I suppose we all desire in this kind of measure—a certain transcendence of normal political partisanship, a coming to grips on the largest consensus that we can achieve in the House and on all sides with respect to a central matter of this kind.

Therefore, I wouldn't in the least—despite what I am going to say in a few moments—wish to be provocative. My comment on that is that when the Premier says he doesn't wish to be provocative—that is poisoning, usually to be his most provocative. I shall use the word in its proper context and not attempt to do that, to not stimulate any unnecessary adrenalin flow.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We will watch carefully. We are listening.

Mr. Lawlor: This is extraordinary legislation. We all recognize it. Under our constitution, we are trespassing, in a sense, upon areas where we have no jurisdiction and no particular power, and this explains in part the tortured nature of the legislation as it has emerged, because somehow it has to be fitted in to the Business Practices Act and to civil rights in the province, although it's directed beyond the boundaries of the province. So you get certain anomalies on which I can only commend the legislative draftsmen and Mr. Atkey, who participated in this process, in being able to come up with a bit of a gem, twisted though the pearl may be in some ways.

Secondly, as has been mentioned in this House several times now, Mr. Don Jamieson of the federal Parliament presented some legislation at an earlier time or commended it to the House. Nothing has ever been done about it. They have trod water in this particular area and there is a feeling that some spurring in this particular regard with respect to our self-determination and certain practice which I think we find questionable would be circumvented or eliminated.

Now, the letter from my colleague, which was mentioned, is a letter to Mr. Atkey. I won't read it all. I shall simply comment on it. The second paragraph reads: "I recommend to the caucus that we support the bill in principle, but I have serious concerns about the draftsmanship of the bill and the wide and, I believe, unintended ambit of the bill. While one can think of many examples, I have tried to narrow them down to two or three which directly reflect the concerns which I have." Then he mentions the South African situation, the apartheid policies and our way of expressing our international discontent with that particular policy.

For individuals in this province to consort together or even the single individual to announce publicly that he or she does not wish to purchase South African wine because of the declared policies of that government might—and I think in the close reading of the bill, almost certainly does—bring that individual within the ambit of this legislation and subject to the very onerous fines and penalties that this bill contains. Surely that wasn't the intent in that particular context.

The second example that was mentioned is, "It would appear to me," says the member for Riverdale, "that if I, Jim Renwick, took part in a boycott, similar to the grape boycott of a few years ago which was in support of the United Farm Workers in California. I would be subject to the enforcement provisions of the bill." That, in a strike way, is perfectly true.

Now I will introduce what I consider one of the complexities of the bill. In that particular kind of context, it seems to me that not necessarily would you be caught within the ambit of the legislation; it would depend upon the reasons that you gave, in the particular context. This applies generally to this bill and it is kind of an interesting point. Under this bill, or the bill as I suppose it is intended to be amended, if the discrimination or the boycott is directed against ideology, there's nothing that I can see under this bill against saying: "This is a Marxist-Leninist product; therefore I won't, and I don't want you, to buy it." Or, "I don't want you to sell that particular product to a Marxist-Leninist outfit" or "a fascist outfit," or—and here's a tricky point—"a Zionist organization."

Whether that's a designation within the ambit of this legislation, with respect to geographical location, race or creed, there are tricky points that will come up in committee on that, as to whether, say, Zionism is credal in nature or not. I personally have some great doubts about that. So by wording the grounds on which you are prepared to discriminate in such a way as to circumvent the legislation, that objective can fairly be achieved.

The Premier said he didn't expect that we would go into detail—nor do I intend to, not in any great depth—but I do think it's helpful in a debate of this kind, in advance of committee hearing, to know where at least some of us feel the areas of discontent or weakness might be in the legislation. I intend to point out only three or four of these major considerations.

My colleague mentioned the native peoples in northwestern Ontario perhaps taking boycotting action against merchants in order to force the civic fathers to take particular stances with respect to their native rights or their voices being heard in the community. Again, that would fall foul of the legislation.

If one of the members of this House then went to northwestern Ontario and spoke to the Indians, spoke approvingly of what they were seeking to do, trying to aid them, that member—or any citizen of the province for that matter—would possibly be subject to criminal and other penalties in that regard. It would be considered a kind of conspiracy in restraint of trade, or at least as falling within the specific terms of the legislation.

None of this was thought of, because the mind was focusing on a particular objective. It is precisely for that reason this House exists, to cut back into that and to expose ramifications which were not intended and which can certainly be deleterious to civil liberties and to basic benefits.

I would like to refer to whatever committee subsequently meets, an article, which again was dug out by the honourable member, from the Harvard Law Review, volume 91, 1975, page 659: "Political Boycott Activity and the First Amendment." I won't go into it; I leave it for perusal. It analyses the issue in depth and with intensity as to the impact on boycotts generally in the United States, particularly with respect to a certain case called Claiborne Hardware Incorporated versus NAACP, having to do with the town of Port Gibson in Mississippi where certain blacks set up a systematic protest against racial discrimination and began to boycott the merchants of that town.

The court in that instance at the state level held them liable in damages, granted injunctions against them, said they infringed against a whole host of common law remedies and state statutes; for instance, anti-trust legislation in the state which they said had been infringed, the tortious liability with respect to the interference in business relations, restraint of trade conspiracies, all this stuff was brought against them and they suffered very dire consequences.

There are cases going the other way in the American jurisdiction now but the Supreme Court has had the very devil of a time on the issue because of the peculiarities in the United States. The first amendment is deemed by some judges of the Supreme Court to be a plenary right of free speech. Nothing can trespass upon it. To other judges it has enormous flexibility and is highly conditional et cetera. One of the conditions very well could be that the interest of the state government, in its anti-trust legislation, supersedes the right to free speech.

It also depends upon the mentality and basic temperamental acumen of the judges, as to whether they happen to be a little to the right or a little down the middle or in which direction they proceed early in the morning. This is a peculiar problem that does not apply here. However, it might be a good idea to make some reference to free speech in section 2, I think it is—the protection of free speech within a confined context. This would give recognition to that principle in this legislation and as it will be interpreted by the judiciary.

On the second page of my colleague's letter, he says: "I suppose in legal terms I am saying that the right of peaceful picketing for information purposes through this kind of boycotting activity would be significantly curtailed if not prohibited by the terms of the proposed bill." I would say very true indeed—and not just in picketing either. Just the conveying of information or the business of dealing or not dealing in terms of contracts would be curtailed. It need not necessarily involve the picketing aspect at all, although that should be taken into consideration.

There are three kinds of boycotts. There is a primary boycott—that is one person or country refuses to deal with a second person or country. That is not in question particularly, although it is in terms of this bill. But let us take the case of some of the Arabic nations and Israel. I think they consider it back and forward fair game. I mean to say, "If you don't want to deal, you don't want to deal." That is life in the raw and it is a very difficult situation.

It is the secondary and tertiary boycotting that is really the nub of the issue. Secondary boycotting is when one country or person, as a condition of dealing with it or him or her, requires the other country or person not to deal with a third country or person on certain grounds. That is really the questionable point.

Tertiary boycotting goes even further. It prohibits for instance one Canadian company from doing business with another Canadian company which does business with a designated company. It goes even further than the Arab boycott situation. It also appraises the share ownership or capital holding on a racial basis of individuals within a particular country; say, about 30 per cent is the norm, although there is a very wide variety and spectrum of the terms and conditions of the boycotting imposed.

Each of the 20 countries has its own criteria. There's a certain core of similarity. It could be 15 per cent or it could be 30 per cent in this particular context. It has to do with shareholders and with who the directors of the company are and the positions they occupy in the business and in the intellectual life of that country. It has to do with the hiring practices of a particular corporation and its source of materials. This office—I think it's in Beirut or Damascus—will send a questionnaire to the company involved. If the company doesn't reply, it is automatically blacklisted. If it replies, disclosure has to be made of the sources of the materials and as to whether particular firms are supplying parts within the country itself that is dealing with the foreign territory.

This is very searching, far-reaching and pretty invidious when you get to that particular point with respect to hiring practices and promotion and the capabilities of individuals who are being placed under a cloud and not being able to advance. On the other hand, it's a highly selective process. As I understand the situation, none of the countries in question excludes the financial institutions of the other countries from participating in such things as bond drives, the raising of capital and in banking concerns. That's a fairly sacred territory for all of us, but it's not impinged upon. It's a preserve that's not touched.

There are a fair number of these; for example, anything to do with arms manufacturing. You get your arms where you can get them, I suppose. You don't ask for colours of skin or eyes or any other colours. You seize upon it. There's a certain cynicism involved in that where these issues begin to touch the bone.

There has come into my hands—and I don't think it's a breach of any confidence—a possible amendment to the legislation to make it more palatable to us to meet the objections raised by the member for Riverdale. This bill must have efficacy and avoid these trespassings upon the liberties of the individuals in this province to a wide diversity of things. Sometimes it even serves the cause of the right. The right has its little boycotts now and then. What's being proposed is not partisan.

I'll read the clause into the record for the purposes of the committee that is coming on and then make a brief comment on it. In section 4, having to do with the refusal to buy or to sell from particular persons for seven specific reasons, having said all that, it says where the refusal or agreement to refuse is at the behest of another party as a condition of engaging in business with that party.

By and large—and until I can speak to the member for Riverdale I wouldn't dare say for sure—that seems to me to fairly satisfy our objective. I've given it some thought and tested it against the various situations that have come to mind. It may very well meet the objection. I leave it for the committee and the record to peruse.

As I said previously—and I don't want in any way to derogate from the legislation as it stands—it may be possible to close some of the loopholes that I propose to bring to your attention. One I've already ventured upon. If I say I will not buy a certain product and encourage others not to do so, too—whether it comes from a foreign country or not—that falls outside the legislation. If you approach it from the point of view of ideology, the same kind of thing happens.

If you say, for instance, "I will not deal, because of the governmental apparatus, with Chile," that falls inside the legislation because it's a mention of a geographical location, and that's taboo. You can't say, "I won't buy South African wines," because, after all, they're talking about South Africa. The legislation says that you cannot do that. But if you say, "I will not buy wine from people who are addicted to apartheid," then I suspect that you're outside the legislation.

We don't want legislation that depends upon sheer cleverness, upon the wording that you impose upon a particular situation. I don't think that was the intent. If it is, then, Lord, there are lawyers enough, and others, but lawyers enough to devise an endless number of ways in which companies and individuals in this province could thumb their noses at the legislation as it exists. That has to be given very careful consideration.

The second thing I would bring to your attention has to do with situs. It seems to me, and I could be wrong, that under this legislation if an Ontario company goes down to Montreal, sits at the Bonaventure, signs a contract there, and designating in the contract the situs of the contract as the province of Quebec, that would fall outside the legislation.

That may not be so, and if it is not, let's take the next step. If a company in Ontario was given so drooling an offer from the Saudi Arabians on a particular type of air conditioning equipment that they just didn't feel they could possibly refuse, they could set up a subsidiary, incorporated company in the province of Quebec and be home free, as I understand it. I'm not counselling, but I'm saying you don't have to be a Philadelphia lawyer to read it that way.

Part of the problem, I suspect, in the legislation is that in the governing section, section 4, it reads: "A refusal or an agreement to refuse by a person in Ontario." That same formula is repeated in paragraph 2 in connection with the tertiary boycotts. Somehow that has to be refined. When you say "by a person in Ontario," do you mean located when he's doing it in Ontario or don't you really mean an Ontario person, a person or a corporation which has been and is resident in Ontario?

Just what does that mean? Perhaps, I suggest, an unnecessary ambiguity, an escape hatch in the legislation, which might be easily rectified. I would ask that the powers-that-be around here turn their attention to that.

I won't go on beyond this point on these things. We can resume our discussions in a more minute way in the committee. With these various thoughts, I think it'll have to be agreed that the legislation is really symbolic. It is more than a gesture, it's a symbol. For those who depreciate symbols, so be it. They may be reductionists; they may be positivists; they may be scientific-minded individuals; so be it. Symbols, to the rest of us, are enormously important things. They show what the meaning of human relationships and the relationships between countries might be.

To venture upon this particular area requires, and the government should be given it, a certain recognition in my opinion. It requires a certain courage because it would be so easy to refrain. It would be a step back because we are on either virginal ground or trespassing on no man's land in this particular area. The very fact that it's there shows a sense of disapproval; a sense that in certain contexts, this kind of game can't go on.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: Mr. Speaker, I am, of course, confident that all members would agree that any form of discrimination on the grounds of race, creed, colour, nationality or ancestry, and place of origin is simply intolerable and unacceptable to the people of this province. As a government, we have committed ourselves to fight, and where possible, to eliminate the forms of discrimination which manifest themselves in this province. We have taken and we will continue to take each and every action appropriate in this struggle.

Ontario was the first province to pass human rights legislation in Canada. I believe we were the first province to introduce a law reform commission in the English-speaking world. The commission, as you know, has dedicated much of its efforts to enhancing individual rights. It appears we will be the first jurisdiction in Canada to pass such legislation. It is before the House in the form of Bill 112; legislation to prohibit discrimination in business relationships.

We have developed multicultural and educational programs to create positive understanding of these problems and the importance of the multicultural mix in our country and the Ontario community. Of course, in the final analysis, the war against discrimination can only be won if we enlist and obtain the efforts of individual members of the community.

Obviously, legislation alone can never eradicate discrimination, prejudice or racism. No matter how much direction is provided by the Legislative Assembly and by community leaders, commitment on the part of each and every member of the community is necessary for any success in the ongoing struggle.

It is a struggle in which the responsibility of the individual citizen is particularly heavy and obviously it can never be won by legislators alone. It is equally clear that the responsibility of legislators is no less important or serious because of the fact that individual initiative in the community is of such great importance. If anything, the responsibility that does exist within each responsible citizen—or should exist—perhaps increases the responsibility of legislators to provide leadership, to lead the public and to attempt to mobilize public and community support wherever possible towards the goal of eradicating the disease of discrimination.

At the same time, we recognize that as legislators surely we have a duty to respond to initiatives that come from the community and, indeed, from other communities and other nations in the struggle in so far as it lies within our power to do so. It is in the context of this duty that I turn to the specific manifestations of discrimination which now command the vigilance of this assembly and the force of our laws.

Many words in the English language have, with usage, changed their meaning from words perhaps formerly commendable, to be words with loathsome connotation. Perhaps no example of this is better or more striking than the word "discrimination" itself. That word, according to general dictionary definition once meant, "to make a distinction, to use good judgement." Unfortunately, it has now been very much tainted with the pejorative connotation of prejudice.

We, unfortunately, have seen discrimination in this sense in our streets, on our public transportation, and in many other areas of human relations; and wherever it arises, and where we can within our jurisdiction attack it, this government, together, I am sure, with the support of all members of this Legislative Assembly, will attempt to deal with it in a positive manner.

In recent months we have learned that discrimination, of course, is not restricted to our streets, but regrettably is becoming more and more evident in the marketplace, in business and in commerce in the broadest sense. Therefore, it is as an endeavour to cope with this relatively new challenge that the Premier has introduced into this House An Act to prohibit Discrimination in Business Relationships, and which is now, of course, before us for second reading.

From the Premier's statement, on introduction, it must be obvious that one area of concern to the government, and a concern to which this bill addresses itself is the area of the Arab-Israeli boycott. But it should be pointed out, and it should be observed, that the statement of the Premier had much wider connotations than this conflict, this boycott or attempted boycott, as important as it is, because he obviously spoke in very general terms of ethnic or religious background or affiliations.

Therefore, it should be noted and emphasized that this is not an issue, and the principles on which this legislation is based should not simply be considered as a Jewish or as an Israeli issue, for in preparing or in casting our legislation, great care has been taken to bring it within the framework of our constitutional competence. When one reads the legislation, it quite clearly deals with civil rights within our province in a very broad sense. The right of employment, the right to trade and the right to contract are surely all basic rights that must be protected in the best interests of all our citizens.

We know, regrettably, that efforts are continually being made in the context of business relationships to deny certain of our citizens some of these basic rights. If, as a term of contract or as a condition of doing business, it is specified that an Ontario company shall not deal not only with a specific country but with a specific company, whether it be within Ontario, within Canada or within another country, then it must be observed that the scope and opportunity for development, not only of Ontario companies but of citizens of Ontario, would be severely restricted.

Certainly it is particularly abhorrent to observe the potential for interference with these basic human rights to be accomplished by legislation of nations over which we have no power or control whatsoever. Surely if it is a condition of doing business in Ontario that an employer be restricted from hiring certain individuals at the behest of a foreign country, then such restriction cannot be tolerated, nor can we tolerate restrictions which would endeavour to stop business dealings or transactions between Ontario companies simply because one company may not be able to meet some discriminatory foreign law or policy.

As has been observed, this problem has been faced in the United States by federal legislation which, unfortunately, has not been duplicated or emulated by our own federal government. It has been quite clear from the debate to this moment that all parties represented in this Legislature regret very much the failure of the federal government to initiate legislation in this crucial area. It certainly has been the position of the government of Ontario that it would be more appropriate and more effective to have federal legislation. Quite frankly, it has been our hope and our expectation right up until the present time that the federal government would move in this direction, because obviously the areas of trade and commerce, money and banking can be much more effectively dealt with, and in some circumstances can only be dealt with, by the federal Parliament.

In approving second reading of this bill, in adopting the principles of this legislation, as it would appear the members of the House are prepared to do today, I think it's fair to say that we all join as one in again urging the federal government to demonstrate leadership and introduce legislation in this area. Notwithstanding the failure of the federal government to do so, the province of Ontario recognizes that we have responsibilities as well, as did certain of the United States which enacted certain legislation before, I believe, the legislation was enacted by the federal government.

Mr. Roy: Are you sure?

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: And I think it is important that as a result of the legislative efforts undertaken by the federal government of the United States and certain individual state governments, that it can now be reported in one American business magazine, and I quote:

"Close observers of the US-Arab trade area in the past few months are expressing considerable optimism about the inclination almost every Arab country has to accommodate the needs of the American suppliers and satisfy US anti-boycott legislation regulations."

Again, in the New York Times of June 12, the following is stated:

"Just a year after its enactment, legislation designed to combat the Arab boycott of Israel and companies with business interests in Israel appears to be having effect. A number of Arab countries have relaxed their requirements while American trade in the region has even increased."

One would hope that these developments might have served at least as some spur, as some encouragement, to our own federal government to introduce legislation.

A number of people in Ontario, people in the business community for example, have said to me and others on the government side of the House that at this time, particularly when the economic situation is difficult, that as a province we simply cannot afford to risk alienating wealthy buyers and people who would like to enter into agreements with companies in Ontario. Whether or not that has been the result of the US legislation, and it would appear from the recent press comments I just referred to that it has not been, I want to emphasize, and I know I speak for all of us in this House, the fact must simply remain that human rights cannot be bartered for a few dollars or for many dollars, and it is in this spirit that we are approaching this legislation.

Specific examples can be given of a secondary boycott involving attempts by United States firms and individuals and specific countries to pressure firms in Canada and Ontario to refrain from dealing with Israel as a condition of trade, or of a tertiary boycott which attempts to prevent firms in Canada or Ontario from dealing with firms in their own country because of the relationships of some of these firms with Israel. I'm sure such specifics are well within the knowledge of many members of this Legislature.

In this respect, I commend to all members of the Legislature the report of the Commission on Economic Coercion and Discrimination. The commission was made up of many eminent Canadian scholars, businessmen and politicians.

We recognize that there may well be some further refining to this legislation. We have taken great care in drafting the legislation to date. We have invited comments from many parties and many individuals, both within and without the Legislature, in order to produce the most effective legislation and legislation which is clearly within the legislative constitutional competence of Ontario, and we will continue to do so.

Mention has already been made of some of the very thoughtful and very relevant comments made by the member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick). I have read those comments and have considered them. There's no doubt but that he makes some very valid observations which must be taken into account before this legislation is passed.

I look forward to working with the member for Riverdale and interested members from all sides of the House in producing the best possible legislation in the circumstances, because there can be no doubt that this is very important legislation, landmark legislation. From a symbolic standpoint, as stated a few moments ago by the member for Lakeshore, it certainly is a clear indication, not only to the citizens of Ontario but hopefully to the citizens of the world, where we in the Legislature stand when basic human rights are involved.

Mr. Conway: I rise to support the principle of Bill 112 for the reasons which have been so ably put by my friend from Kitchener (Mr. Breithaupt) and, through him, by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. S. Smith) who has been on record for some months now on this matter.

I do so because I agree entirely with what the Attorney General has said in his agreement with the member for Lakeshore about the importance of symbols within politics and the broader community. I do so because I think that a bill that has as its purpose and intent an action by government against discrimination in Ontario on the ground of race, creed, colour, nationality, ancestry, place of origin or geographic location of persons employed in or engaging in business is a particularly laudable principle.

I agree entirely with what the Attorney General has just said about the importance of this Legislature collectively and its members individually, indicating to the broader community what we think of discrimination on those grounds. I agree entirely with the Attorney General when he says that this must surely be a bill to recommend itself to Ottawa to do things it has chosen not to proceed with, at least at a rate which we would expect acceptable.

But it's sad and it's disappointing for some of us to stand here today and listen to these speeches about the importance of symbols and the importance of the message of symbols to the broader community, particularly when it relates to matters of race, creed, colour, nationality, et cetera, when some of us remember not so very long ago the intervention of the Premier of this province on a matter which some of us felt very strongly was in principle a matter of symbols in some of those related areas.

I find it very difficult to stand here today and to be told by leading members of that ministry that symbols are important in so far as they deal with our actions on the broad international questions when those symbols were not nearly as important on matters of urgent domestic and local import. I would certainly expect this government and I would certainly expect this Premier to be somewhat more sympathetic to the importance of symbols as they relate to some of our local, provincial and national concerns, some of which are directly related with the principle and the purpose of Bill 112.

The high statesmanship to which the Premier falls heir in Bill 112 is something with which I am happy to join him in support on this occasion because I think and I know he is right. The matters of discrimination on the basis of race, religion, nationality and the like are abhorrent to us all. I must say, though, that I sometimes wonder why, on the basis of the same criteria, more high-profile and punitive action was not taken with respect to certain members of this assembly when they appeared, at least, to go on the record with what appeared to be comments of a racial kind with respect to the native people of this province.

The present member for Timiskaming (Mr. Havrot) may have been misquoted—and I am not here to say that his remarks with respect to native peoples were particularly well-reported at the time—but I expect a consistency from my Premier in the matter of symbols, particularly where they relate to race, religion, nationality and the like.

There were some of us growing up not so very long ago, embroiled in a famous schools question.

Ms. Gigantes: Did you support Dr. Jackson?

Mr. Conway: The member for Carleton East very properly draws attention to the controversial public attitudes of the commissioner on declining enrolments. I know and can sympathize with her opinions in that respect. I would suggest to the Premier, who I am sure needs no such suggestion, that consistency on this principle is at best a difficult, unheroic task.

The history of our politics, and indeed present practice, indicates that western countries—not the least of them the United States, to which the Attorney General made reference—will, when economic imperatives dictate, do business with every tinpot dictator extant anywhere on this globe. Let's understand that. Because the United States' administration has taken high and moralistic positions, certainly with respect to items of this kind, I notice a very interesting debate recently concluded in the Senate with respect to arms agreements with certain countries in the Arab block.

As my colleague from Ottawa East was suggesting to me just a short time ago, the power of oil has indeed had an accommodating influence on certain of our principles. I have been impressed by the necessary accommodation, however repugnant I might find that accommodation. Similarly, I am happy to know that it is only high statesmanship which motivates the Premier in this respect. I am happy to know that there are no domestic political considerations, may I say imperatives, guiding him through the course of this legislation and what it represents. I know that, and I am happy to share in that feeling.

I just want to say, Mr. Speaker, that Bill 112, as the member for Riverdale has pointed out, is something which needs legislative refinement if we are going to avoid encompassing in the bill and in its operation, many groups not intended to be covered by the bill. I found it interesting, in that respect, to note we are not expressing an abhorrence to boycotts per se or to the general principles of other boycotts, because it is clear from section 3(2) that certain boycotts are quite acceptable to us.

I appreciate the Premier's concern in this respect. I will agree with Bill 112 in principle. But I want him to know, as carefully and as forcefully as I can state it, why I agree with Bill 112. I agree with it because I feel strongly that the Attorney General and the member for Lakeshore are right when they say to us and to the people of Ontario that Bill 112 is of fundamental importance and deserving of our support because it stands as a symbol, because it stands as a principle to people to understand our views on these matters.

I only wish the Premier of this province would express a similar concern and a similar approach to symbols with regard to discrimination in matters of language, race, and religion, et cetera, which relate to this province. Matters which have unfortunately not been addressed by him in this session, with the same degree of high statesmanship as Bill 112 for which I commend him.

Mr. Samis: Let me preface my remarks by stressing—I emphasize that word "stressing"—that I speak as a person who supports the right of the state of Israel to full independence, full territorial security, and integrity.

I speak as a person who is cognizant of the tremendous suffering and injustice that has been perpetrated upon the Jewish people in the history of mankind. I speak as a person strongly opposed to all forms of racial discrimination, racial prejudice, bigotry and any ideology based on any form of racism. I find them all, totally, without exception, abhorrent.

But I also speak as an individual, and as a legislator, who cannot, and does not, support the principle of this bill. Obviously that is a dissenting opinion. Obviously that is a minority opinion in this party and in this House. But I think it is fair to say there is dissent outside this House. There is dissent in this province. There is dissent in this country. There is dissent on this continent. And there is dissent in western society in general, on this whole issue.

I would like to outline four basic reasons why I cannot support this bill:

First of all, I genuinely and sincerely believe this bill should not be before this Legislature in the first place. I understand the sentiments echoed by the Attorney General and the Premier regarding the revisions of the bill to try and focus on civil rights which comes within the purview of provincial jurisdiction, but I can't in my own mind not be aware of the fact that this bill deals with foreign trade, foreign commerce, and a foreign political situation. I sincerely believe that would be far better and more rightly taken care of in the federal Parliament rather than one provincial Parliament, or even all 10 provincial Parliaments.

Secondly, I believe, in the context of the dramatic breakthrough achieved last year by President Sadat of Egypt in his visit to Israel and his direct negotiations with Prime Minister Begin, this sort of bill really is out of keeping with the general spirit of those peace negotiations. I know those negotiations are stalled. I know those negotiations are encountering serious difficulties, but they remain the single greatest source of hope for lasting peace in the Middle East in the 30 years since the foundation of the state of Israel.

To me this bill is sort of a hangover, a reminder, of those days of confrontation, mistrust, and stalemate. As I say, I just don't think it is in keeping with the temperament and spirit of the times on the international scene.

Thirdly, I believe this bill can interfere with the rights of citizens in this province. The member for Lakeshore has very articulately given examples where someone may want to protest and boycott South African products, Chilean wines, Rhodesian products, California grapes, lettuce, J. P. Stevens' products—you name it. This bill could have implications for people who want to exercise their philosophical or very deep personal moral disgust with the policies or actions of another government and have that right to refuse to purchase products on that basis.

I find the bill very sweeping in its powers and in its wording. I'm afraid it's open to situations where the democratic right to protest economically is either denied or severely infringed upon in this province.

I don't intend to get into any partisan posturing or politicking. But when speaking on this bill I can't help but refer—as alluded to by my colleague from Renfrew North—to the record of this government's treatment of the largest minority in this province. It certainly doesn't inspire confidence in me when he talks about rights in other parts of the world being violated or about rights being violated in this province.

My fourth reason for opposing the bill—and I should say this is probably the most fundamental reason—is that when we have a situation where a country has part of its territory militarily occupied by another power, and that power is clearly militarily superior and refuses in principle to end that occupation, then I believe that a country, a nation, or a people has every right to resort to such economic weapons as boycotts to aid it in its struggle to recover its homeland or any part of its homeland.

I'm referring to the situation in the Middle East today where one country occupies land, clearly recognized as not belonging to it, but belonging to the people of Egypt, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon. Whether you abide by resolution 242 passed by the United Nations, or whether you abide by the statements and declarations made by President Carter of the United States in the last 18 months, or some of the initiatives and statements made by the American State Department, it's almost universally recognized that the key to peace in the Middle East is, and must be, Israeli withdrawal from those occupied lands.

In the absence of the withdrawal sought by the United Nations, sought by President Carter and almost every country in the United Nations and around the world, and in the context of what any military occupation means inevitably in terms of civil rights and basic human dignity, I cannot support a bill which ignores that fundamental consideration.

Boycotts of an economic nature are not a weapon used only by Arab countries, nor were they inventions of the Arab states. I would call to your attention, Mr. Speaker, some examples prior to the boycott we're considering today.

In 1931, the Republic of China instituted a boycott against Japan to protest Japanese aggression and atrocities.

In 1951, the United States instituted a brief boycott of Czechoslovakia to protest the 10-year imprisonment of journalist William Oger.

In 1962, the United States instituted a boycott against Cuba. I believe that boycott is still in effect notwithstanding the recent attempts at rapprochement between President Carter and Prime Minister Castro.

The Organization of African Unity has instituted and still has a boycott in effect against South Africa to protest the apartheid policies of that country.

I believe there is presently a partial United Nations boycott—or series of sanctions—against Rhodesia to protest that country's treatment of its black population over the past 10 to 15 years under the Smith regime.

It's clear that economic boycotts are not new; nor are they confined to the Arab countries, nor are they an illegitimate weapon to redress an injustice.

There would be no boycott and no need for a boycott if the occupied lands were to be restored to their rightful inhabitants. The goal of peace in the Middle East will only be achieved when all sides respect resolution 242, passed by the United Nations. The very existence of that boycott today is a direct result of that occupation. It's interesting to note that many thousands of Jews in Israel today are protesting the intransigence of the present government and its continuing policy of occupation of Arab lands. In fact, I believe last night that 40 per cent of the members of the Knesset voted against the policy announced yesterday by Prime Minister Begin and Foreign Minister Dayan.

It might be interesting to quote from an article in last week's Time magazine, June 19, entitled, "West Bank: The Cruellest Conflict," because I think Time is rather well known for being sympathetic to the cause of Israel.

Mr. Rotenberg: They're totally pro-Arab.

Mr. Samis: I think if you look back at the history of Time magazine you'll find that the policy is anything but pro-Arab, especially if you qualify it as totally pro-Arab. May I just quote two paragraphs in this article which try to explain what the problem is, which I think is relevant to what we're discussing today.

"Many thoughtful Israelis, hawks and doves alike, are alarmed by the long-term impact of the continued occupation on Israel, as much as on the West Bank. Says Emmanuel Sivan, a professor of Islamic history at Jerusalem's Hebrew University, 'For the generation of Israelis in their twenties, the occupation has been the natural order of things; this is certainly bad. They have learned that the Arabs are at the lower end of the ladder, which creates a vision of each other that is not conducive to coexistence. I'm not worried about whether or not we can hold on to the territories. But the price we pay worries me. Here we are, a democratic society, holding another society hostage.'"

It goes on to quote Uri Avneri, editor of the Tel Aviv weekly magazine—and I apologize for the pronunciation—Ha'olam Haze. The quote is: "The occupation is an unmitigated disaster for Israel. The fact that the Palestinians remain without their dignity poses a greater danger to Israeli security than any long-range benefit Israel could have from the military side of things."

It goes on to quote biblical expert Shemaryahu Talmon of Hebrew University who says, "The occupation goes against the basic attitudes of Zionism. It's clear that we have not been able to turn the situation of ourselves as occupiers into one of co-operation."

Mr. Speaker, it's very clear that there's a serious problem on the West Bank, in Gaza, Golan and southern Lebanon. In the absence of a withdrawal I cannot support a bill that does not recognize the legitimate reasons for such a boycott and ignores the basic injustice that does exist in the Middle East today. I think, Mr. Speaker, instead of focusing our attention on a bill like this, our time might be better spent supporting any and all efforts for peace by either side in the Middle East or by our federal government.

In short, in all honesty and in conscience I cannot divorce this bill from the historical and actual situation in the Middle East today. On that basis, I cannot support it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I want to address this bill in the context of Ontario, Ontario's citizens, and our record of protecting civil liberties and civil rights, which of course is what this bill is all about. It is not at all about those things the previous speaker has addressed. We are not here this afternoon, nor have we ever been on this bill, to attempt to resolve things in the Middle East. In fact, the whole reason we're standing here today is to see to it that Canadians, free Ontarians, be they businessmen or otherwise, are not unwillingly and unwittingly enlisted into that war, or dispute.

I did, and still do want, to keep this debate at the level which other speakers have referred to; a nonpartisan debate, one pointed towards restoring, regaining, and respecting those civil liberties and rights that our people here in Ontario have always had and had protected by government of whatever stripe. Therefore, I will not use my few moments to attempt either to educate the previous speaker in the realities of the Middle East situation or to try to explain to him at great length that this debate and this legislation should be taking place, regardless of which external power was involved. Under no circumstances can we tolerate being dictated to by external forces and powers so that one Ontarian is required to discriminate against another.

I urge members to put this in a better perspective. If this were as open and as blatant as some of the other examples that sadly we have seen through the years in North America and other places, then even the last speaker would be falling all over himself to join the rest of the members of this assembly in passing this bill into law.

I urge the members to consider for a moment that if we were talking about legislation emanating out of discrimination between Ontarians which resulted in school doors being locked, people being forced to the back of buses or using separate health, kitchen or restaurant facilities, being denied entrance to arenas and parks, being in fact separated from other Canadians in Ontario, in the absence of those things one can see on the 6 o'clock news, in the absence of some children being bused to another part of town or not being bused, or being put into sub-standard school facilities or other facilities, or being denied entrance to high schools—in the absence of those things some people might believe that things that they can't see and don't deal with every day aren't occurring.

To expect Ontarians to put up with a situation where a businessman can lawfully, if you would, sign a contract agreeing that he would not do business with other residents and citizens of Ontario, simply because that other person happens to be of the Jewish religion, simply because that other firm happens to deal with Jews—those things are as vicious and as serious and as wrong as the things you can see on the 6 o'clock news when people bar children from entering schools or push people to the back of buses.

It is a rather proud day for me—I say so unabashedly. I had the pleasure of introducing, as a private member, as the member for Kitchener has noted, Bill 39, the predecessor to this bill. I introduced it a little over a year ago—on April 19, 1977. Predictably there has been some opposition. I have heard more of it since I joined the cabinet, obviously from people in the business community who are concerned about the loss of business that the Attorney General and others have spoken about.

I have made this point time and again since I originally introduced my bill and it still stands—if anything it is more valid today than ever—that in this country we have gone to very great lengths to protect those things that are the cornerstone of our democracy: freedom of the press, freedom of expression and freedom of religion. The reason we go to such lengths is because it seems to me that we have always acknowledged that one small foot in the door leads to the second foot in the door and then an army through the door.

I think of the dialogue the Attorney General and others have had, and I certainly have had, with those who from time to time speak of how horrendous it is to publish the names of those who are charged and not yet convicted of offences. The argument there is that although just publishing the fact of the charge often destroys a person's reputation for life, even though he may ultimately be proven to be innocent, that we must suffer that wrong in the name of freedom of the press.

Mr. Deans: That's not true.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Freedom of the right to know.

Mr. Deans: He is wrong on that one. The minister may be right in what he is saying but he is wrong in that.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I might say, without debating whether he is right or wrong, that the point is that we in this country and this province have gone to very great lengths—

Mr. Deans: That's fine, but it's a bad example.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: —to make certain tradeoffs; and in each case we have made erroneous tradeoffs in order to prevent, for whatever reasons, that first small toe, let alone foot, from getting in the door. So we do go to very great lengths, and I agree with going to such great lengths.

Mrs. Campbell: It's a poor example.

Mr. Deans: It is a bad example, right.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: One must think back to the books of the horrendous, the tragic, the awful—there are no words sufficient to describe—tales we have all read of what happened in the late 1930s and early 1940s. We have had those brought to light more graphically and on a larger scale by the Holocaust presentation on television recently.

I raise that at this time because of the number of people who have commented, because of their own personal reading of the history and seeing these matters on television, about how the rest of the world could have stood aside and stood silent. Many people during that period of time begged off. They did not want to get involved. They did not want to get involved because on day one it didn't affect them, and they didn't think it would ever affect them. A lot of people stood by and watched the liberty, freedom, dignity and lives of others stripped away from them while they sat quietly. They did not rise up, in the early days, and say that in the long run this will destroy all of our civilization; and in the short run, in any event, I cannot sit quietly while the freedom of others is encroached upon just one little bit.

Why did so many people say that? As so many people indict the people who did that, they indict them knowing that those people stood by quietly, in many cases in fear for their own lives, in fear for their own families. They didn't want to get involved lest their own lives would be in danger.

Yet we, shockingly, some short years later in terms of history, find ourselves in a time now when others say they do not want to get involved because they may lose some contracts, they may lose some business; and many of these same people are the very ones who have on other occasions indicted those who sat back quietly because they were afraid for their lives and limbs in the 1930s and 1940s. So while they indict those people they are now hesitant about risking a couple of contracts, some money, some dollars; they are prepared to look past the enforced discrimination between Ontarians which is that one small foot in the door.

This assembly has always strongly supported, on all sides, the leadership that has been shown in this province in terms of human rights legislation, the Ontario Human Rights Code, the Ontario Human Rights Commission. Indeed the actions taken by this government in 1975, when it said to terrorists we don't want you in this province, and if the United Nations is not prepared to keep terrorists out then they better not come—

Mr. Conway: Thanks for Dorothy Crittenden.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That attitude has always been very crucial to the health of democracy in this province, as well as the freedom so many people feel to come to this province and to live in security and freedom.

[5:30]

I cannot put the case strongly enough that unless we are prepared to run whatever risks there might be in terms of contracts and in terms of business to say to people outside this province, outside this country, "You will not come in and tell one person in this province that he or she must, should or shall discriminate for racial, religious or other reasons against another citizen of this province," we risk a serious inroad on our democracy and our freedom.

We must have the courage now to provide that backup every Ontarian is entitled to; and that backup is to know that the laws of his province—indeed we only wish it were the laws of this country—are such that any citizen can stand up and say, "I am sorry, in this democracy I cannot be asked, nor shall I be permitted to be asked, or forced, to discriminate against any other citizen."

That is what this bill is all about. That is precisely what this bill is all about. It is important that when this small step is being attempted by some they be told here, as they have been told in other places, that that is unacceptable in this bastion of freedom, human dignity and respect.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few brief comments on this legislation. My attendance is sometimes criticized, but I always want to participate in a debate where we're dealing with an important principle that rises above partisan differences, as stated in this bill, and where all parties in the House agree that we're against all forms of discrimination based on "race, creed, colour, nationality, ancestry, place of origin or geographical location."

Such a principle gives a certain approach to debates in the Legislature. We can form a common front and send a message concerning what we in the Legislature feel about this principle; and what stand as leaders representing the people of this province, we are prepared to take, and what leadership we're prepared to give in this area.

I have listened to the comments from my colleagues, the member for Kitchener (Mr. Breithaupt), the member for Lakeshore (Mr. Lawlor), the Attorney General (Mr. McMurry), my colleague from Renfrew and others. They have dealt with various aspects of the bill which I don't intend to deal with. Having read the bill, the principle is an honourable one and worthy of support, but the method or vehicle that we are using here is a difficult one. The bill is fraught with technical difficulties. At times, I suppose, there will be administrative difficulties for this type of legislation.

It's always a difficult matter to put forward legislation upholding a principle as important as this one, and at the same time respecting other important principles we in this province and in this country have and believe in; principles such as freedom of action and freedom of speech. The balancing act becomes extremely difficult. I am hopeful that once the bill is sent into committee we can deal with some of these aspects together.

As the member for Lakeshore has said, and as the member for Riverdale (Mr. Renwick) has communicated to the members of the Legislature and to the Premier (Mr. Davis), there are difficulties which may well impede such things as freedom of action and freedom of speech in this province. I must say that in looking at the legislation, and a principle as important as this, it is very important that the people of this province and this country have a clear message; and that message has far more weight when it is supported by all parties, and it has credibility.

Let me give an example of that. For instance, people like to talk about high principles, about freedom and respect for the individual; of human nature, the right to due process, the rule of common law. If, for instance, one looks at the constitution of the USSR, and the principles as stated there, and then looks at some of the actions of that country and its president who signed the Helsinki agreement to respect minorities, to respect various individuals, there is some hollowness there because we know their actions and sometimes the positions they put forward do not correspond with some of their actions and some of their policies in their own country.

Compare, for instance, the President of the United States, Jimmy Carter, when he talks about human rights and when Brezhnev does so. One can see the difference in credibility—even though the US at times, for matters of national policy or otherwise, is prepared to deal and to exchange goods with countries we find questionable. But I think there can be no doubt about the sincerity of the President of the US as compared to leaders of other countries when he's talking about respecting human dignity and respecting human rights in this world.

I say to the Premier it is important as well that we recognize, if we're going to give this principle weight, that we have this credibility. I say it objectively and I say it in sadness more than I do in anger, that there must be consistency in our approach.

The previous speaker talked about some of the things that have happened and how we are against some of the things that have happened in the last war.

And on a recent visit to Israel, when talking to the Israelis one could see the difficulty of the situation there and the insolubility of the problem.

But the fact is, Mr. Speaker, that there must be consistency in our approach. I say to the Premier that when I look at some of the things that have happened in the last while—at least since I've been in the Legislature—that just as we like to rise above partisan politics, to give as common front as possible to such an important message, that there must be credibility in our approach. We should be careful when we get into the areas of language, or religion that we are not forced to take partisan approaches in these fields.

I would mention, for instance, was it wise in 1971 during the election to get involved in separate schools in our own province? This is something that has concerned me—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, so there is no misunderstanding, our party did not, your party did.

Hon. Mr. McMurtry: That's right.

Hon. Mr. Davis: That is right. That is historically and factually correct, and I think the honourable member should be very careful.

Mr. Cunningham: The only thing that is correct are the results.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Albert, it is true.

Mr. Roy: I should put it on the record, Mr. Speaker, that that is not the way most people in this province viewed the events. The decision, in fact, was made—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, on a matter of personal privilege, because I think the record should show this. The position taken by the member's party—by his party's former leader prior to 1971, Mr. Wintermeyer; and the position put by the New Democratic Party under the leadership of one Donald MacDonald in 1964 or 1965—if memory serves me correctly, was categorically that with the introduction of the Ontario Foundation tax plan—

Mr. Foulds: No, you are wrong.

Hon. Mr. Davis:—which was to resolve the issues of the separate schools in this province, both of those gentlemen said their party would not support the extension of the separate school system. Historically, Mr. Speaker, the member for Ottawa East should know this. It was his party leader. It was the leader of the New Democratic Party who changed their party's policies; and to that extent it was an issue in the 1971 campaign.

Those, Mr. Speaker, happen to be the facts. That's true.

An hon. member: The Premier would like to make them facts.

Interjection.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Speaker, if I may continue, I say to the Premier those may be the facts as he sees them, but the fact is—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Ask your own leader. You ask the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk and he will agree.

Mr. Roy: I just raised the matter, Mr. Speaker, because I feel—

Hon. B. Stephenson: Facts are facts.

Mr. Roy: I just feel—and I listened to the Minister of Labour who just said something which I didn't get—

Hon. B. Stephenson: I just said facts are facts.

Mr. Roy:—but who was still practising medicine at that time.

An hon. member: A Liberal then too.

Mr. Roy: Yes, a Liberal then, probably.

An hon. member: Not a very good one.

Mr. Roy: I say to the Premier that the perception and the reason this matter became—

Hon. Mr. Davis: The member's party altered its position.

Mr. Roy:—an issue in 1971 was because the Premier some time before the election made a ringing declaration that there would be no further extension to separate schools and this is how—

Mr. Speaker: That has nothing to do with Bill 112.

Hon. Mr. Davis: On a point of personal privilege: I think the member for Ottawa East should know the truth and the facts. I didn't make a ringing declaration. I had been approached by the bishops of Ontario with a brief asking for the extension of a separate school system.

Mr. Deans: As had we.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I was in a position where, prior to that time, every political party in this province was not in favour of the extension of a separate school system.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, it was the members opposite—

Mr. Speaker: I have ruled that the comments dealing with the separate school system were out of order, so therefore any reaction to those would also be out of order. The member for Ottawa East.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am out of order. You are quite right. I know the facts and I wouldn't revitalize that issue.

Mr. Roy: I quoted that as an example of something that can be extremely divisive.

Hon. Mr. Davis: But you people made it that way.

Mr. Roy: Well don't say that. You know it's not so.

Hon. Mr. Davis: You did and you paid a price for it.

Mr. Roy: I say that the Premier feels that he can stand here or go around the province and keep saying things that don't meet the facts.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well it's factually true.

Mr. Roy: Just because you say so it's not so. There is a perception across this province—and it is unfortunately a perception that became an issue. I say that is the type of thing we should avoid. Now, Mr. Speaker, I go one step further.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Speak for yourself. You avoided it. We didn't make it an issue.

Mr. Roy: I go one step further and talk about the credibility in the message. I say to the Premier that the actions for instance that took place on June 1 were not something which—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Be careful.

Mr. Roy: Don't say be careful. I can say what I want here and—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You are not being careful now.

Mr. Roy: I have not been irresponsible in my statement here.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You are inaccurate now.

Mr. Roy: I say very simply, Mr. Speaker, that the actions that unfortunately took place on June 1 after all members of the Legislature again rose above partisan politics in an effort to take it away from a partisan issue and the statement and the publication of a press statement by the Premier, has made it a divisive issue. That is the type of thing that we should try to avoid.

Hon. Mr. Davis: We didn't introduce the bill. We didn't make it the issue. You did.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are dealing with second reading of Bill 112, An Act to prohibit Discrimination in Business Relationships. It has got nothing to do with something that happened in 1964. It has nothing whatsoever to do with something that happened on June 1. If you will stick to the principle of this bill, I think we would get along much more harmoniously.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Speaker, I just gave that as an example. It was the Premier's interjections in fact which caused me to take additional time on this. I just cited those as two examples.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It's your inaccuracy.

Mr. Speaker: We haven't got back to the bill since.

Mr. Roy: All I am saying is that for the record it was certainly not our attempt to make it partisan. So I say that when we approach problems such as this, it is important that the Premier keep in mind that we are with him, that we support such an important principle as this. But it is important for him as Premier of this province to remember that we take the same approach domestically and provincially that we are prepared to take nationally. I regret that this legislation, even for practical purposes, should be emanating from the federal level. It's obvious that this is a practical approach, and I am saddened that we don't have that initiative, that type of legislation on the books, I am saddened at the same time that, for instance, the federal leader of the Conservative Party did not see fit in the last by-election to renege on one of his candidates who said some derogatory things about a political group on the basis of race and so on.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: But he supports boycott legislation; he supports this legislation.

Mr. Roy: These are some of the things that it is important for those people who ought to give leadership in this field to keep in mind—

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think Mr. Clark supports this approach.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: When he is Prime Minister next year, this will be law.

Mr. Roy:—because their credibility will be enhanced. Members over there should know that we are with them on this type of principle, but again I say it is important that there is some consistency, because it will give much more weight to the message.

Ms. Gigantes: Mr. Speaker, I will lend my support as simply and directly as I can to the principle in this bill which I find supportable; that is, that we in this Legislature should remove those elements of discrimination which seem to be gaining hold in the operations of the Arab boycott within Ontario.

This bill does not deal with the Middle East situation; I think we have to try to remove our discussion of this bill from the Middle East situation as best we can. Nor does this bill attempt to deal with discrimination in all aspects of Ontario affairs. In considering the merits of this bill, we do not have to deal with either the failures or successes of the government or any one of the parties in the past in Ontario.

I think the bill deserves, because of its importance to citizens here in Ontario, to be dealt with on its own merits.

There are parts of the bill to which other speakers have referred and which are troublesome and may be completely objectionable. Those parts relate to the very general prescriptions provided within the bill on the operation of boycotts. The Attorney General has told us we can't eliminate discrimination and racism by legislation. I have a great deal more faith in the potential of legislation than I think the Attorney General does.

I think the bill before us does offer the very negative benefit of eliminating boycotts which may be designed to end discrimination and racism, either domestically or internationally. I think that part of the bill has to be subjected to drastic revision before we can feel satisfied that the bill is achieving the ends for which, in principle, it will have my support.

The bill is called "An Act to Prohibit Discrimination in Business Relationships"; it is meant, as the Attorney General said, "to provide protection against discrimination for Ontario citizens in the areas of trade, contracts and employment." I think we can make this a much better bill; the people of Ontario deserve to have a better bill dealing with this problem.

The principle to which we seek to address ourselves, as we review this legislation, the principle that there shall not be discrimination against citizens of Ontario involved in business here in Ontario, is one that we want to isolate and reinforce, and not confuse with the kind of very wide and worrisome anti-boycott provisions, as they are now proposed to us in the bill.

With those comments, Mr. Speaker, I offer my support in principle for Bill 112.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I will just speak briefly to the principle of the bill and make some comments that might be useful for those in the House who are now coming to the point where we will be asked to express our views by way of our vote.

You have ruled, very properly, that a discussion of who was responsible for the divisions in this province in 1971, having to do with separate school support, is out of order. But in connection with this bill there are perhaps one or two things that might be said.

There are those in the province who consider the Premier's action with regard to the bill before us hypocritical and cynical. I don't believe that's so; but I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we followed with a great deal of interest and care his progress with most of the press gallery, and some members of the press who are not even in the gallery, on the much-publicized peregrination through the Mediterranean and to Israel, the Holy Land, and the broad acceptance by all reasonable people of what a remarkably successful journey that was.

By way of his interjections, his reason for delaying the progress of this bill, as I gather, was that he was trying to bring pressure on the government of Canada to take what he considered to be suitable action. I suppose there are those who say the government of Canada has not taken suitable action and others who feel it has. The justification for the whole process, enumerated by my colleague the member for Kitchener (Mr. Breithaupt), has been that the bill has been pending with all the flags of publicity flying around it for so long that there are those who would be very critical of the motivation of the Premier in this regard. We hear he is about to travel to Israel again. There is no doubt he would like to have in his quiver of press releases a reference to the importance of the bill we undoubtedly will support with an almost unanimous vote when this debate is completed.

The argument put forward by the member for Ottawa East is that when we are asked, from a high position of principle, to approve a bill of this importance we should not be too quick to be critical of those who can't help but question the motive. It even goes back—not to the matter of 1971 although there is a similarity—to the debate in this House on the extension of rights to the French community here, which has already been spoken of by two or three speakers, and not been ruled out of order.

Mr. Speaker: Not while I was in the chair.

Mr. Nixon: I don't know about the consistency of the chairing, but I would certainly respect your rulings and I don't intend to dwell on that.

While the Premier can always justify in his own mind and to those around him—for whom he can do no wrong—the high principled sensitivity, the importance and the moderate justification of his stance in 1971 and last week, his trip to Israel, his forthcoming trip to Israel—all of those are justifiable, they're moderate in his own mind and have nothing to do with the principle of these bills—yet it is difficult sometimes for his political opponents to accept all those justification without at least a tremor.

I don't know what the significance of that is other than to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, and to that of the Premier if he is paying attention, that we don't believe his motives in all cases are precisely as he himself has maybe described them. It gives us some concern when his approach in this moderate, sensitive and high position fits in so conveniently with some of his other plans.

As far as this bill is concerned, we believe the community of Ontario wants the Legislature to express as a matter of principle and by statute that it does not believe international arguments and confrontations should be allowed to impose themselves in our community—in the business community or in any other way.

The bill may not be perfect in every respect, but the principle of the bill is that. It's a principle I can support without hesitation and a principle that our party will support.

Mr. Rotenberg: Mr. Speaker, I will be speaking for more than seven minutes so I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: We've got seven minutes. We might as well make good use of them.

Mr. Breithaupt: It might be convenient if we were to complete this bill even if it were a few minutes after 6 o'clock.

Mr. Rotenberg: I would like to speak in support of this bill and thank the members of the House who have expressed their support for the principle of the bill.

First, let us understand what the principle of this bill does not do. It does not intend to legislate against primary boycotts. It does not intend to legislate against those who may say they don't want to buy California grapes, or South African wine, or Rhodesian something else, or Cuban something else. Those who drafted the bill, and those in the community who have given considerable support to the bill do not intend to legislate against a group of Arabs if they got together in Toronto and said, "Do not buy Israeli products." There is no intention whatsoever to discuss primary boycotts. For this reason, I accept in full the letter from the member for Riverdale and the comments of the member for Lakeshore. The amendment he has suggested, as far as I am concerned, is perfectly in order.

What is the boycott? The Manitoba Human Rights Commission commissioned a study and I would like to read from that study very briefly. It says: "The first component of the boycott is primary." Of course, we know that. But "Arab firms applying a secondary boycott against Canadian firms, require proofs that these Canadian firms are not involved commercially with Israel, a friendly country.

They also apply a tertiary boycott, as a condition of trade requiring their Canadian trading partner not be involved commercially with any other Canadian firm which is trading with Israel, a form of restricted trade practices. Canadian trading firms which are recipients of investment money are required to give information regarding the presence of Jews on their boards of management or on the boards of management of other Canadian companies with which they do business. They are also asked to refrain from doing business with companies which are blacklisted by the Arab League."

The investigation of this Manitoba Human Rights Commission committee revealed that "Canadian chartered banks are processing letters of credit with boycott-related provisions. Canadian firms are complying with secondary and tertiary boycott provisions. Canadian insurance companies are insuring contracts with boycott-related clauses. Canadian boards of trade certify boycott compliances" and so on.

That is what is going on in Canada today. As many people have said, it is abhorrent to anyone who believes in civil rights.

What does this Arab boycott do? I would like to read a letter from the League of Arab States, secretariat general, central office, for the boycott of Israel, to a firm in the United States. This is typical of what firms in Canada have been getting. I will read it:

"We wish to inform you that we have acquired reliable information to the effect that your company has purchased a majority interest in a Maltese firm—I won't read the name—"which is banned in all Arab countries since March 12, 1977, because of the fact it imports from Israel fabrics and textiles and uses the same raw materials for its products of overalls and other work wear. Under the rules in force of Arab countries, it should have been necessary to apply the ban imposed on your said subsidiary, on your own company and all of its subsidiaries. However, in manifestation of the positive nature of the Arab boycott, we are now writing to you in order to give you the chance to arrange for the settlement of the position of your said subsidiary if you have the desire to avoid applying the ban on your company and all of its other subsidiaries."

They ask for a declaration as follows: "Do you or any of your subsidiaries have now, or ever had, a main or branch factory or assembly plant in Israel; have now, or ever had, general offices in Israel for regional or international operations; grant or ever granted the rights of using your name, trademarks, manufacturing licences, patents, et cetera, to Israeli firms or persons; participated or owned shares now, or in the past, in Israeli firms or businesses in or outside Israel?" On it goes.

I would have liked to have read this whole letter into the record, but it asks for names and nationalities of all companies. "It should be noted the above questionnaire represents in a nutshell the basic rules of the Arab boycott of Israel. If your answer to any of the former six and final questions is in the positive, it means that you are violating the rules in force in the Arab countries."

Without going into any other matter, how can anyone support this kind of letter coming to firms in Ontario and saying that firms in Ontario have to sign these kinds of letters? I think it's abhorrent to everyone in this Legislature. The boycott asks Ontarians to violate the human rights code, asks them to practice racial and religious discrimination.

The bill before us, with the amendments I hope as proposed by the member for Lakeshore, constitutes an affirmation of the right of all Ontario residents and businesses to engage in open and unfettered trade with all countries in the Middle East, free from threats of discrimination based on race, creed, colour, nationality, ancestry, place of origin, or geographic location.

Aside from the member for Cornwall (Mr. Samis)—I'll deal with that in a moment—there are some objections to the principle of this bill. They are really twofold. One is that people say they will lose business; and secondly they say we should not get involved in the conflict.

As far as losing business; many years ago when we brought in a fair employment practices act a number of businessmen said, "Look, I can't be forced to hire Negroes, Jews, Italians, Ukrainians, or what have you because my other workers won't work and I'll lose business." We ignored that argument and we passed fair employment practices. We brought in a fair accommodation practices act, and landlords said, "You can't force me to bring in blacks, Jews, Ukrainians, Italians, et cetera because my other tenants will move out." We ignored that and we passed those two pieces of legislation and we have not had a loss of business because of those kind of anti-discrimination legislation. I submit that the same would apply to this legislation.

The experience in the United States is very interesting. A number of US companies have defied the Arab boycott before the latest legislation and a number of them have not conformed. Three companies in particular get honourable mention: Hilton Hotels, Coca-Cola and Ford, three very well-known companies. These companies defied the Arab boycott in the early days and were black-listed by the Arabs. In a very short period of time, the Arabs decided that business was more important than boycott and all those companies are now doing business in the Arab world.

American Express gave in to the Arab boycott and did not do business in Israel for a number of years. Then they decided to tell the Arabs that they didn't want to go with the blockade any more, went into Israel and opened up offices, and the Arabs have never kicked them out of the Arab countries.

Mr. Speaker: How much longer will the honourable member be with his speech?

Mr. Rotenberg: As I indicated, Mr. Speaker, about another 10 minutes at least.

Mr. Speaker: Shall we continue with this item after 8 o'clock or not?

Hon. Mr. Welch: We have this alternative: if the House would allow another five or six minutes, and then we add it onto the supper hour at the other end; or we would have to put this over because of some other commitments with respect to our program.

Mr. Peterson: Five minutes maximum.

Mr. Deans: Is that sufficient?

Mrs. Campbell: He said he would be 10 minutes.

Mr. Deans: Is five minutes enough?

Hon. Mr. Welch: Should we take another five minutes and add it to the supper hour?

Mr. Speaker: Agreed.

Mr. Rotenberg: A number of other American companies—Sheraton Hotels, General Dynamics, Lockheed, General Electric—all refused to comply with the boycott, went to Israel and still do business in the Arab states.

The one that probably is the best example of the fact that the Arabs really don't mean it is the Chase Manhattan Bank, which is the agent for Israeli bonds. It is probably the financial institution in the world that participates in the development, growth and economy of Israel more so than any other. Yet the Chase Manhattan Bank has offices throughout the Arab world.

We have consultants who complain they won't get business. One of the main oil drilling consultants to Saudi Arabia is a gentleman from Texas who happens to be Jewish. He flies in and out of Saudi Arabia all the time. When they want to do business, they do business.

We have Bell Telephone, which wanted to comply with the boycott. I think it was abhorrent to us. We have to understand the only other bidder to Saudi Arabia was Western Electric in the United States, which is subject to the American laws and couldn't comply with the boycott, so that business would be there anyway.

There will not be loss of business in Canada, because since these laws were enacted in the United States last year, according to the New York Times, June 12, 1978, I quote: "Just a year after its enactment, legislation designed to combat the Arab boycott of Israel and companies with business interests in Israel appears to be having an effect. A number of Arab countries have relaxed their requirements, while American trade with the region has even increased. Moreover, trade with the three hard-line countries—Iraq, Syria and Libya—has increased at a faster rate than trade with other Arab countries."

It goes on and on. I see a lot of other things that I would like to read into the record. A prominent New York banker, who had earlier believed that the Arabs were not going to budge from the boycott, told the American Banker magazine April 19, 1978: "We have seen a lot of modification on the part of the Arabs. I have to admit that I was completely wrong on this."

I would submit that those in Ontario who are going to claim that this legislation will cost them business simply have to look over the border. The Arabs are adopting bullying tactics and bullies will always try to get their way; but when someone stands up to them they will back down. This is the experience on the boycott.

The other objection is that we shouldn't take sides in this conflict. I quite agree, but what are the sides? Let me quote to you from a publication in Syria in September 1977. We have to realize that anything printed in Syria is official government policy, because they don't have a free press the way we do. This article states:

"The Arab states regard the boycott as a legitimate form of self-defence against the dangers of Zionism, which threaten Arab civilization no less than the Arab economy. The aim is to force Israel to vacate occupied lands and concede Palestinian rights." This is the key phrase: "The Arab boycott is a national effort, part of the Arab strategy against the existence of Zionism." The Arab strategy against the existence of Zionism is the euphemism for destruction of the state of Israel.

The best chance is for all of us in Canada and other countries to stay out of the conflict. The problem has been that many countries in the world have been getting into the conflict. Mr. Brezhnev with his deliberate trouble making, and Mr. Carter with his clumsy meddling have not helped the situation. They have encouraged the Arabs to be intransigent; and it is the Arabs, Mr. Speaker, who are intransigent.

I wanted to stay out of the Middle East conflict, but unfortunately the member for Cornwall, who was well briefed by someone in the Arab propaganda machine—

Mr. Samis: Point of order, point of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Deans: That is nonsense.

Mr. Samis: That is not true, that is simply not true.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the honourable member for Wilson Heights to withdraw that comment.

Mr. Rotenberg: Well he said he wasn't well briefed by anyone and he got the facts himself, I apologize. But the member for Cornwall made some very essential mistakes, and the most essential one, and the key to what he said, is that the boycott was brought in to ask Israel to withdraw from the lands they liberated in 1967. I would point out to him the Arab boycott came into force in 1948. So it has nothing to do with the 1967 territories. For the member for Cornwall, I point out very briefly: one, the West Bank and other territories are not Arab territories, they are part of the original British mandate; they are part of the territory assigned to Israel.

Mr. Roy: Different people have different views on different events.

Mr. Rotenberg: Different people have different views on different events. The UN resolution 242 does not require Israel to withdraw from all the Arab territories. The resolution was specific in leaving out the word "all" and leaving out "the."

Mr. Samis: In 1967!

Mr. Rotenberg: In 1967. I have it here, and it simply says it was brought in because the Arabs, after the 1967 war and their Khartoum conference, issued a statement which still stands in all Arab countries: "No peace with Israel, no negotiation with Israel, no recognition of Israel." That is the Arab stand today.

Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the member for Cornwall, Mr. Sadat's visit to Israel was a lovely propaganda adventure. Since that time he has totally pulled out of negotiations, and has said, in effect, "Unless you do it my way I will not negotiate; unless you give all the territories to the Arabs, which are not rightfully theirs, as a pre-condition of negotiation, I will not negotiate." That is Mr. Sadat's point of view.

Mr. Conway: Begin is so much more flexible.

Mr. Rotenberg: Mr. Begin has given more concessions to the Arabs than any other Israeli government in the past 30 years.

Mr. Deans: This is really not what this debate is about.

Mr. Rotenberg: And the final point I would like to make to the member for Cornwall—

Mr. Deans: I hope this is not what the debate is about.

Mr. Rotenberg: You should have stopped your member for Cornwall.

Mr. Deans: I just think you are going a little beyond the normal constraints in this kind of a debate.

Mr. Rotenberg: Mr. Speaker, with respect, the member for Cornwall was allowed to go through all of this, and I want to reply very briefly to him. The last point I want to make to him, he mentions that Israeli public opinion does not totally agree with its Prime Minister. This is, of course, true, because Israel is a democracy. In any of the Arab countries, and there are millions of people in the Arab countries who want peace, if anyone speaks up against the Arab governments, they are put in jail or are dead.

Mr. Samis: It is irrelevant, David.

Mr. Rotenberg: Well then, why did you bring it up? Mr. Speaker, really what I am saying to everyone except the member for Cornwall is I appreciate the support for this bill, because this bill really takes Ontario out of the conflict and off the battleground. As long as those letters come into Ontario, as long as Ontario businessmen are forced to sign those letters, in effect, they are being made soldiers in the economic war of the Arabs against Israel. As was the American experience, most of the people would rather not sign those letters, so if they are precluded by law, then we take Ontario away from the battleground and stay neutral. I, as a Canadian, an Ontarian, as a member of this Legislature say, "Yes, we must stay neutral." Personally, I would rather we were a little more on the other side, but I cannot ask for that at this stage.

Mr. Speaker, hopefully the United States' experience will be repeated in Canada. First New York State passed the legislation; then several other states passed the legislation; when it got up to nine or 10, the American government passed this legislation. Now Ontario will pass it; Manitoba has the bill before the Legislature; hopefully the Canadian government will get the message.

Mr. Speaker, a few years ago the American government asked the Canadian government to boycott Cuba, and we refused. If we as Canadians can refuse our best friend, our best trading partner, and a democracy, if we can refuse to accede to the request of a democracy to boycott a military dictatorship, certainly we can refuse the request of a military dictatorship to boycott a democracy. I hope this bill will pass.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I have a fairly lengthy summary to make, but I will take 30 seconds and just express, having introduced this bill, my appreciation to the members who have spoken in support. I regard it as important, historic legislation, not without its complications.

I understand some of the observations made opposite with respect to motivation. I will ignore those, except to make this casual observation: I guess people in political life on both sides of the House can have their motives questioned from time to time. At your direction, Mr. Speaker, I will not refer to the observations of the member for Ottawa East (Mr. Roy) about the situation in 1971 as it related to separate schools—

Mr. Roy: Because it was out of order.

Hon. Mr. Davis:—except to say I think I'm right; I know the honourable member is wrong.

Mr. Deans: I think you're both wrong.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered for standing administration of justice committee.

Several of the above meetings were held jointly with the Cabinet Committee on Confederation. Also in attendance at meetings were the secretary and from time to time, other civil servants.

90. Mr. S. Conway (Renfrew North): What were the "most recent proposals put forward by individuals, groups or governments in the field of constitutional reform" that the Advisory Committee on Confederation considered prior to the drafting of its first report? Hon. W. D. McKeough (Treasurer): The Advisory Committee on Confederation is kept informed of the latest developments in constitutional reform and other Confederation issues by means of a list of background material. This list is prepared regularly by committee staff and circulated to both the advisory and cabinet committees on Confederation. The list includes articles, speeches, papers, conference proceedings and other items pertinent to the work of the committee. Although certain documents are automatically distributed to all advisory committee members, individual members may order any document which interests them.

TAX EXEMPTIONS

92. Mr. E. Ziemba (High Park-Swansea): Further to my original inquiry of April 18, 1978, will the minister list the realty transactions receiving exemptions by way of application directly to the Ministry of Revenue itself, indicating the purchase price, date, location and value of exemption with respect to the Ontario Non-Resident Land Transfer and or Speculation Tax in Metropolitan Toronto and Mississauga? [Tabled June 6, 1978.]

Hon. L. Maeck (Minister of Revenue): The attached schedules A, B and C provide the additional information requested concerning exemptions from or deferrals of, tax under The Land Transfer Tax Act, 1974, as a result of direct application to the ministry.

Section 18 of the Land Speculation Tax Act, 1974 forbids giving the information requested with respect to transactions under that statute.

INQUESTS ON WCB FATALITIES

93. Mr. E. J. Bounsall (Windsor-Sandwich): Of the 282 accidental deaths in 1977 in which there was a coroner's inquest, will the Solicitor General (Mr. Kerr) indicate how many of these deaths were from the 226 Workmen's Compensation Board reported fatalities? [Tabled June 6, 1978.]

Hon. G. A. Kerr (Solicitor General): Figures which the ministry has received from the Workmen's Compensation Board indicate that there were 246 claims relating to deaths which occurred in 1977. Of these, 212 were investigated by a coroner. 51 were the subject of a coroner's inquest. Four inquests are pending as charges relating to them are still outstanding.

METRO SCHOOL BOARD

67. Mr. D. Warner (Scarborough-Ellesmere): Would the ministry please calculate for 1977 and 1978 the financial impact on the six area boards (on both general legislative grants and mill rates) of the elimination of the Metro Toronto School Board; and provide the information in a format similar to Tables 17.1 and 17.2 of the Report of the Royal Commission on Metropolitan Toronto, volume 2, pages 326 and 327? [Tabled June 6, 1978.]

Hon. T. L. Wells (Minister of Education): The information in the accompanying table provides data as requested for 1977. The data necessary to prepare similar tables for 1978 are not available to the ministry at the present time. Additional information is therefore being sought from the Metropolitan Toronto School Board and will be available in early July.

LEGISLATURE OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, JUNE 20, 1978

The House resumed at 8:15 p.m.

CHILDREN'S INSTITUTIONS ACT

(concluded)

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for second reading of Bill 117, An Act to revise the Children's Institutions Act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The honourable member for Bellwoods.

Hon. Mr. Norton: The member got back from the garden party.

Mr. McClellan: I got back from my party; and if we can dispose of the rest of the legislation I can return to the garden party.

Mr. Makarchuk: Are you out of your mind?

Mr. McClellan: It is my intention to do so.

The act before us, Bill 117, is one which we are prepared to support. The legislation is of a piece with the Children's Residential Services Act. The intention of the two pieces of legislation, as I understand it, is to introduce for the first time the notion of appropriate standards to children's residential services in Ontario. How could one possibly object to that?

In the absence of any kind of explanatory statement from the minister, I quote from page 45 of the summary of the children's services legislation: "This bill is the re-enactment of the existing Children's Institutions Act. However, the main objective of the changes is to enable the implementation of appropriate standards as they are developed."

It's curious legislation, because it is legislation which, as it says, enables the implementation of standards if, as and when they become available. As yet there are no standards. I suppose there are thoughts about standards; there are people who are thinking deeply about standards, there are people who are prepared to issue policy documents at some point distant in the future telling us what those standards may be; but even if we pass the legislation tonight, which we will, there still won't be any standards. This is a very bizarre performance.

I hope the minister will tell us when he makes the statement on this bill and on the Children's Residential Services Act, which is the licensing statute, when, if ever, he intends to provide these standards to us. It really is a mind-boggling exercise. To illustrate how desperately standards are needed, we've had a history of discussion in this House about the inadequacy of standards with respect to the Children's Institutions Act, and more particularly the Children's Boarding Homes Act, and facilities licensed or authorized under most of those statutes. All of that discussion is on the record. We had another illustration this afternoon of just how bizarre is the lack of supervision and the lack of accountability between this ministry and residential facilities under those two statutes in this province when the minister tabled the answer to my question, number 37, on the order paper.

The question was tabled in April and it asked the minister to advise us further to a gun safety memo which the ministry had sent around in February to children's aid societies and directors of group homes established under the Children's Boarding Homes Act, the Children's Institutions Act and the Children's Mental Health Centres Act. I had asked the minister to identify which residential facilities had firearms and for what purpose group homes which were established to provide treatment service to disturbed children would have firearms.

Today, we were given the answer. In 16 homes authorized under the Children's Boarding Homes Act, there were a total of 33 firearms. The uses are bizarre. I wonder why a children's boarding home would have one large .306 gun. I am wondering why a group home, a residential treatment facility, would have an eight-millimetre German Mauser. The eight-millimetre German Mauser is described as being used for hunting big game.

Mr. Makarchuk: Oh, no! Is the minister out of his mind?

Mr. McClellan: The residential facility in question is located in Markham, one of the more fabulous big-game hunting sites in the world I am sure. I wonder if the minister would lead us on a safari through Markham.

Mr. Makarchuk: Markham Serengeti it's known as, isn't it?

Mr. McClellan: The minister could distribute surplus firearms from his residential treatment facilities to the members of the House and we could proceed through Markham or whatever other fabulous hunting ground he would care to identify.

Hon. Mr. Norton: You would have a coup d'état. You know that's what you are after.

Mr. Foulds: It may come to that if you keep up with this kind of stuff.

Mr. McClellan: Why do children's treatment facilities in Ontario have guns? What kind of madness is this? What kind of a ministry is he running over there? What kind of incompetence does this manifest that there are 33 dangerous firearms in 16 residential treatment facilities for children? It's absolutely loony.

Mr. Foulds: That's being kind too.

Mrs. Campbell: That is not parliamentary, however.

Mr. Makarchuk: Anybody that's got a Mauser in a children's home—

Mrs. Campbell: Stupid.

Mr. McClellan: "Stupid" is a good word. It has been suggested by the member for St. George that "stupid" is perhaps a more apt characterization.

Mr. Blundy: She was referring to your remarks, not the bill.

Mr. McClellan: As I said, I hope this statute will bring about the licensing of residential group homes in this province for the first time on an adequate basis, on the basis of some standards. That would be nice. It would be even nicer if we had the standards. It would be nice to know what those standards are. It would be nice to know whether the standards include equipping group homes with eight-millimetre German Mausers or not.

Mr. Blundy: Mr. Speaker, when one looks over this bill that the minister has presented to us this evening, there are all kinds of things about the approvals of bricks and mortar; there are all kinds of clauses about the financing, the capital costs, et cetera.

This is all very important, of course, I realize that; but we are talking about a children's institution, and we should be talking about the provision of the services that are going to be provided to the children in the institution. My friend the member for Bellwoods has made a very interesting observation about some of the guns and ammunition and so forth. But we in this Legislature, who are really interested in the services that are to be provided to the children who are going to be in these homes, want to know what is going to be done for the children.

It is necessary, of course, to know that an institution will be provided, that it will be financed and so forth; but I will tell the minister before we approve this bill on third reading we are going to have to have a heck of a lot more information in committee than we have in this House tonight. I naturally am going to stand up and say we approve of second reading of the bill. We expect it will go to committee, and we will be provided with a great deal more information as to what the children of this province are going to have and how the children will profit by this bill. We are giving notice to the minister that before it receives third reading we are going to have to have a great deal more detailed information on the bill and on the services provided to children by the facilities provided by the bill. I endorse, therefore, second reading of the bill and the sending of the bill to committee.

Mrs. Campbell: I will be brief, Mr. Speaker. I think my colleague has expressed very succinctly and usefully the feeling of this caucus with reference to the bill. I would just add one point: I am concerned that the approval mechanism is now buried with the minister. One of the problems we in the opposition have had, both with this ministry and with the Health ministry as it pertained to children's services in the past, has been the aura of secrecy surrounding the information about these institutions.

The minister has called upon us to rise and support, as a matter of high principle, what he has brought before us. I want more than just the caution to the minister; I want his commitment that from here on in we will be able to obtain the information pertaining to the operation of these institutions which has been denied us in the past. I don't like to see so much in the hands of the ministry, because I guess it is only a fool who doesn't learn from experience.

I have had the experience of two ministries which have deliberately refused information to the opposition. If this is to be a tripartite attempt to act together for the betterment of the welfare of the children of this province then it can stop with the passing of the legislation, and I would like to see somewhere some assurance that the spirit of co-operation which the minister is seeking will not be a one-way street once the legislation passes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there any other honourable member wishing to participate in the debate? If not, the honourable minister.

Mr. Makarchuk: No, we want to hear the minister; not for too long though.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate the concerns that have been raised by the honourable members opposite with respect to some of their comments. I am not sure that I would agree with the honourable member for Bellwoods that this is entirely a mind-boggling process. I would suggest that the process which we have undertaken is a very complex one, one in which it is not possible, however much we might wish that it might be, to ensure that all things mesh at one particular time.

Mr. McClellan: Or even if anything meshes.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I hope that not all complex things are mind-boggling for my friend opposite, but I can assure him that I will do my level best to help to unoggle the mind in so far as that is within my power.

Mr. Foulds: So far you are not doing very well.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Just give me an opportunity.

On the question of the standards, which he has raised as a matter of concern, I assure him they are well on their way to preparation. We are aiming for the end of July or the first of August for having the proposals with respect to standards completed, to be consistent with the process that we have undertaken. At that time we intend to discuss those with the members opposite and some of the agencies that are involved, and certainly I would be terribly disappointed if they were not available for members before the committee begins consideration of the legislation. That, of course, may depend in part upon the schedule of the committee which is as yet not familiar to me.

Mr. McClellan: September.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I won't respond to the honourable member's language, be it parliamentary or unparliamentary. I suppose one of the things in this House or in the tasks we have undertaken that we have to deal with is the use of that particular kind of language from time to time, however enlightening it might be.

Mr. Makarchuk: Just respond to the issues.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Well, I am sure that the language of the honourable member is not all that enlightening. If, in fact, I am stupid,

I am sure that it has been something which all of the members are aware of without any need for him to enlighten us of it tonight.

I also will not respond, although I would invite the honourable member to raise his concerns about the firearms in question period, suffice it at this point to say that I can assure him—

Mr. McClellan: I raised it. Why should I raise it again?

Hon. Mr. Norton: This is not question period and I suggest to the honourable member that we do in fact—

Mr. Foulds: This is a period for information. What kind of a schoolboy answer is that.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I did not say information period. Stop trying to twist things around. The member knows better than that.

Mr. Foulds: This is a point where you are accountable.

Mr. Makarchuk: Are Mausers in your nursery schools?

Hon. Mr. Norton: I suggest that part of the reason one would find firearms in those homes is that many of them—I don't know the specific location of the one to which he referred, and I suspect that it is not—

Mrs. Campbell: You should.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Come on, let's be realistic. It is not possible to know specific locations of hundreds of such facilities across the province, but I am sure it is not in big game country. I will assure him that those firearms, wherever they are to be found, are being stored in accordance with the requirements of the ministry and that that particular firearm is under lock and key and unloaded.

Mr. Makarchuk: Wherever they are, they are unnecessary.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Norton: It's all right for the member for Brantford to try to sensationalize these things.

Mr. Makarchuk: If they want to get them out, they will.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Even though I personally have very strong feelings on the subject, the fact of the matter is that there are hundreds of homes in this province, especially in rural areas, where firearms are to be found safely stored in households. There is nothing unusual about that kind of arrangement. To try to portray it as being otherwise—

Mr. Makarchuk: We are not discussing your average gasoline station or your average home.

Hon. Mr. Norton:—when one considers the fact that this is providing a reasonably normalized—

Mr. Makarchuk: I'm sure you can understand the character of the storekeeper.

Hon. Mr. Norton:—setting for children—certainly one can sensationalize it, sure one can distort it.

Mr. Makarchuk: You do reasonably well about it as well.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Let's just be reasonable about it. The important thing is the issue of safety.

Mr. Makarchuk: That's right, and the people surrounding that firearm.

Hon. Mr. Norton: That is fundamentally important.

The member for Sarnia (Mr. Blundy) did raise some concern about the reference in this act to funding. I would point out again that these are interim amendments. I would see this as an interim step to do two things in conjunction with the Children's Residential Services Act, which we will be dealing with next on the order paper.

If we are to fund any kind of program or facility, it is necessary to have the legislative authority to do that. This is the act under which we would provide the funding for the residential accommodation for children. The other act, the Children's Residential Services Act, which we will be dealing with next, is part of the rationalization process, the process of bringing together and establishing consistent standards for children's residential accommodation across this province to include consistent licensing and residential standards. We must have those two authorities.

I certainly hope—and it's my intention—that in the evolution of the process we've undertaken we will see a consolidation.

Mr. McClellan: The process of the evolution of the process. You are talking about a closed circle.

Ms. Gigantes: Is that like a wheel within a wheel?

Hon. Mr. Norton: We will see in the omnibus legislation a further rationalization of this process. I do want to emphasize this as being interim. The program concerns that the honourable member expresses will be matters that will be addressed in the standards to which I referred earlier and which I hope will be available to the House and the committee, although the House won't be sitting prior to the sitting of the committee dealing with this legislation.

Mrs. Campbell: It has to be.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Our estimates will begin tomorrow but I'm not sure we will get that far.

On the question of the concern expressed by the member for St. George, I trust she appreciates that had circumstances been otherwise and had courts not been involved in relationship to a particular residential facility for children, I would have been quite willing to share information with her.

It is not my intention to treat with secrecy any of these matters, such as the handling of public funds, as they apply to children's residential services or any other program of my ministry. It's my hope and intention to be able tomorrow to indicate to the committee in estimates that we have reached a significant stage in terms of the particular agency—I can mention it, Browndale. I will address myself to that in my opening statement in estimates. I can assure members if there is specific information they wish to have that I am free to reveal, pending the resolution of other matters before the courts, that they will have it.

I don't know whether her shaking of the head indicates scepticism or not, but she herself ought very well to know the kinds of concerns that I would have in terms of possibly prejudicing any case which might be before the courts. I say that because of her experience as a judicial officer, a member of the bench herself.

I do wish to confirm now that it is not my intention that any of the activities in my ministry, funding or otherwise, will be secret. I think that touches upon the major concerns that have been raised by the honourable members opposite, and I'm sure we will have an opportunity to deal with this matter further in committee.

CHILDREN'S RESIDENTIAL SERVICES ACT

Hon. Mr. Norton moved second reading of Bill 118, An Act to revise the Children's Boarding Homes Act.

Hon. Mr. Norton: My opening statement will be very brief. Effectively, the explanation of the principle involved in this bill is included in information which has already been shared with the members of the opposition. Basically, the explanation is simply that this bill will provide for the bringing together of the licensing and standards setting as it relates to children's residential services in the province of Ontario.

As I indicated in my earlier remarks, this bill dovetails with Bill 117, the funding bill which provides the authority to fund such agencies.

Mr. Blundy: I rise to support Bill 118 on its second reading, with of course the ultimate reference to committee for detailed study. I don't know whether the minister fully realizes how much the people of Ontario are waiting to hear the details of all these bills dealing with children's services.

I believe that most of the people who are involved in the delivery of and the control of children's services in the province feel that the amalgamation of children's services is a step in the right direction, but I want to tell the minister that many of the people with whom I have talked are, one might say sitting on the edges of their chairs waiting to find out exactly what is involved and how much better the needs of the children of the province of Ontario will be served.

I'm very interested in the children's services review board, and I certainly hope that when we do study these bills in committee we are going to have a good deal more information in that regard. What could be more important than the children's services review board, which is going to have so much to say about the residential services of children in this province? There is provision for the appointment of the board and the function of the board in the bill, which is necessary. There is, of course, the licensing of the homes under this act and the Day Nurseries Act and the Child Welfare Act, which is necessary.

I just hope that when next we look at the provisions of this bill in committee the minister and his staff will be able to provide us with a great deal more details to reassure the people of Ontario, particularly those who are so dedicated in their involvement in the delivery of children's services in the province. I believe that this bill, along with its companion bills, is a step in the right direction and I would be very happy to see the second reading of the bill and the approval to go to committee.

Mr. McClellan: I'm drowning in bills here.

We intend to support Bill 118 on second reading, secure in the promise of salvation to come.

Before getting into the bill, it is useful to quote from the interministry committee on residential services from 1975, which puts this whole discussion and the discussion of the previous bill into a context. Quoting from the section on page 111: "Non-residential alternative." "It is generally believed," said the senior officials of the ministry in 1975, "better services for children in their own homes and foster homes would reduce the need for placement in residential facilities." How true that was then, and how true it still is today.

We have the replacement to the Children's Boarding Homes Act, which like the previous statute does not have the slightest glimmer of a clue about what the standards will be. But we are assured in the summary of legislation that proposed standards relating to residential services are being developed and soon will be released for consultation. The minister put a date on that today, which is nice. You will have to have those standards by the time we want to start the hearings if you want this legislation to proceed. It's as simple as that.

I hope that, if nothing else, the minister gets that through his head tonight, that we are not so irresponsible on this side of the House as to pass legislation setting standards without the slightest idea of what it is you are intending to do, that would be genuinely irresponsible.

Mr. Cunningham: As opposed to being just irresponsible.

Mr. McClellan: As opposed to being plainly irresponsible.

The interministry report had the following laconic comment on children's boarding homes, which this act repeals and replaces, under the heading "Supervision and Standards"—and what a joke that is—"Perhaps because of the proprietary nature of these services and the somewhat lower standard required by the act, compared to funded children's and youths' residences, they have been more vulnerable to public criticism." It is both laconic and an enormous understatement. All of the facilities that had the guns were Children's Boarding Homes Act facilities; all 16 of them. I think that your response to the gun issue is very irresponsible and totally unsatisfactory. We'll come back to that again and again until you take guns out of children's residential facilities.

The legislation, as I said, is supportable, conditional on an understanding of what the standards, in fact, will be. I have a couple of questions that I will state now and will want to put during the hearings.

Firstly, I am concerned that homes for special care are specifically excluded from the licensing and standards set in the statute. We had been promised from the time before I was elected to this House that action would be taken with respect to homes for special care. Yet they still languish in a Never-Never Land, in a no man's land, under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Health, with inadequate supervision, inadequate standards and inadequate funding. There are retarded people in homes for special care, there are elderly people in homes for special care, and there are kids in homes for special care. The minister is going to have to deal with that. He can't just pretend there isn't a problem there, because everybody knows there is a very serious problem there of institutional and governmental neglect that has to be dealt with, and we will be going into that when the hearings commence.

The second point I want to make has to do with something that was proposed in the original consultation paper and I thought was a very useful measure, but it has disappeared; that is, the children's rights amendment—even a limited children's rights amendment—setting out the rights of children in residential care.

I think it would be useful to include in the licensing and standard-setting statute, the Children's Residential Services Act, a minimal set of children's rights; for example, and most notably, the freedom from the imposition of certain kinds of punitive actions against children; most notably the use of corporal punishment; the use of certain kinds of so-called isolation therapy; the prohibition of laying criminal charges against children who are in the care of a residential treatment facility.

Without reading the very excellent, I thought, presentation of children's rights on page 95 of the green consultation paper, I would like the ministry to give some serious thought to the possibility of an amendment incorporating at least some of the more important children's rights—important in the sense of having been before us in this Legislature through cases in which those rights were violated and in which the violations led in a number of instances to tragic consequences.

As I said before, we support the legislation in a very conditional kind of way, and the condition is that the minister tell us what he is going to do. He can plead whatever excuses he wants—and this afternoon he pleaded a number of what I thought were very silly excuses with respect to his inability to provide standards and guidelines for children's aid societies in child abuse cases. The minister is simply going to have to realize that he and his ministry are under the gun to produce, and the deadline is the hearings that are starting in September; so he might as well reconcile himself to that fact and just work a little harder. I know the minister is working very hard, but let him work a little harder and get something before us—

Mr. Makarchuk: He might have to have a few words with the Treasurer (Mr. McKeough) on those things.

Mr. McClellan:—because he is not going to get our co-operation without giving us the goods.

Mr. Hodgson: We'll do it with or without.

Mr. McClellan: They'll have a little trouble passing that stuff on their own.

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Speaker, I look at this particular bill and I think it disturbs me probably more than any other, because truly, if you read it, you might just as well be talking about licensing the horse-drawn carts that are going around the city in the summertime. There is very little meat in this statute, which to a great extent is the governing statute for so many of the others.

I look at the minister's definition of children's residence. Again we go to the fact that we are dealing with bricks and mortar; we are dealing with a whole building or a part of a building; and at no time is there any infusion of the spirit of what we're talking about—our concern for children.

I don't want to be critical of this minister because I really believe he wishes to reform the situation.

Mr. McClellan: If he would only listen.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I'm listening.

Mrs. Campbell: I hope perhaps some wisdom came out of that exchange.

Hon. Mr. Norton: It certainly did; there is no wiser person.

Mr. Hodgson: Always, Margaret, always.

Mrs. Campbell: I look at the provisions for the appointment of children's services review board. Yes; a member may be appointed for a term not exceeding three years, three members of the board constitute a quorum—so it goes. What is the essential function of these people? There is very little; we have the bare bones.

The minister addressed himself to my remarks about the last bill. I wasn't speaking about any one institution. I was speaking about the difficulty of getting information, so far as I personally was concerned, back to 1973. At that time I knew of no action pending anywhere which could have precluded my right to have the information I sought, either from the Ministry of Health or the Ministry of Community and Social Services. One of the things that distresses me is that I see constantly around this chamber the one person who went out of his way to ensure that no information would be given to the opposition. He seems very apparent, very alive and well, in this community. This gives me a great sense of unease.

Ms. Gigantes: Name names.

Mrs. Campbell: I would really like to be assured that we do not have actively engaged, as a consultant or in some other capacity, people who have made a practice of precluding the opposition from receiving information which they ought rightfully to have had.

If the minister cares to answer, I know he knows of whom I speak.

Mr. Worton: Tell us, Margaret.

Mr. McClellan: He doesn't know, he says he doesn't know.

Ms. Gigantes: Name names.

Mrs. Campbell: You don't know? I thought you knew.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I don't know.

Mr. McClellan: His staff knows.

Mr. Blundy: Let us in on it, Margaret.

Mrs. Campbell: Perhaps we could find out from him what the future for that individual is in the freedom of information within his ministry. I suppose that's what we're talking about.

Mr. McClellan: Name names.

Mr. Blundy: Come on, tell us who it is.

Mrs. Campbell: Again we have a licensing bill, dry as dust, with no standards; no way of really identifying the performance of the children's services review board, no way of making any kind of a judgement.

[9:00]

I think it speaks well for the opposition in this House, and for our commitment to the welfare of children, that we have been willing to go so far with this minister, with this package, which up until now has been pretty much garbage, but which we hope will permit us to have input in committee. What a tragedy it is, that with all of the speakers, with all of the criticisms levelled at this ministry otherwise constituted over the years, we are still going into a committee with almost no real vital information.

I hope the minister is well prepared for what may happen if he is not duly prepared for those committee hearings. It's not going to be easy. In fact, it isn't going to happen without far more meat on these bones at that time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Are there any other honourable members wishing to participate in this debate? If not, the honourable minister.

Hon. Mr. Norton: After all the—and I say this with great respect—sabre-rattling that has gone on tonight, I'm not sure whether I should be trembling or not.

Mr. McClellan: Just do your work and you will have nothing to worry about.

Mrs. Campbell: It is not sabre-rattling, it is the truth.

Hon. Mr. Norton: As I said earlier, I ask the honourable members only to understand the complexity of the task and to accept my assurance that, unless some great tragedy intervenes, the standards, which basically embody what the honourable member for St. George has referred to as the meat under this particular legislation, will be available.

I must say there is some uncertainty in my mind as to whom the honourable member was referring to—

Mrs. Campbell: You are not serious.

Hon. Mr. Norton: —but to the best of my knowledge, there has been no request for information from her to me since I have been minister in this particular ministry, with the exception of the one case to which I referred earlier, where there has been difficulty in transmitting information.

If there has been, then I wish she would bring it to my attention personally. I will reiterate I obviously cannot, although I must be responsible for what has gone on, I am not familiar—

Mrs. Campbell: We're still waiting for information you promised months ago.

Hon. Mr. Norton: —with the earlier incidents to which she refers.

Mr. Blundy: Just don't let it happen to you.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I must say, though, I am somewhat disappointed that she would choose a word like garbage to describe what I think has been, and what I believe she understands to be, the product of a lot of hard work by a lot of very able people, both within the civil service and the province of Ontario, to achieve what we have accomplished up to this point.

Mr. McClellan: Would you prefer stupid?

Mr. Roy: It is you who are being attacked, not your ministry.

Hon. Mr. Norton: No, it's not I who is being attacked when that kind of language is being used, it's a much broader sweep. I can take it, but don't deny me the opportunity to stand up and defend the dedicated people who are working in this province—

Mr. McClellan: Those fine, hardworking people.

Hon. Mr. Norton:—simply on the premise, “Oh no, we’re not talking about them we’re talking about you.” There are a lot of people working very hard in order that this legislation in its present form would be available to members and for this House to meet the commitments that we’ve made earlier this spring or last year.

Mr. McClellan: They’re trying to prop you up. Trying to make you look good.

Mr. Roy: Ah come on. Don’t deflect the arrow on your ministry.

Mrs. Campbell: Or the year before.

Hon. Mr. Norton: We had people who quite literally worked all night long in order to meet deadlines. These are people who only a few short months ago we’re being hailed by some of the honourable members opposite as some of the leading people in the field. Their reputation has not diminished in a matter of a few months. I really don’t think that kind of language is justified in describing the product of their labours.

Mr. Roy: Don’t deflect the arrows from yourself.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Norton: If it is a policy you want to attack, then fine. But don’t refer to as garbage the product of a lot of work by a lot of dedicated and knowledgeable people.

Mr. Roy: When we attack the ministry it’s you.

Hon. Mr. Norton: They’re more knowledgeable in some respect, in perhaps more specific areas, than some of us in this House.

Mr. Roy: Certainly more than you.

Mrs. Campbell: All the more reason we should have the benefit of their wisdom.

Hon. Mr. Norton: And you shall.

Mrs. Campbell: In the future.

Mr. McClellan: In the fullness of time.

Hon. Mr. Norton: No, in the immediate future.

Mr. McClellan: In five years, the five-year plan.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Regarding the citation of the member for Bellwoods, his concern about better services for children in their home, again I just ask let’s not confuse two issues. That is not being dealt with in this legislation but I can assure him, as I have before, that our objectives are in that direction. We have made a lot of headway and we will continue to make headway. In one specific area you will see results once we are able to proceed further down the line with respect to changing our programs relating to training schools and so on.

Mr. McClellan: The process of the evolution of the process.

Hon. Mr. Norton: It certainly is, and if members feel these things can happen overnight, then they are only revealing their own naivety; and I must say that naivety is more complimentary than stupid, silly or irresponsible, which seems to be the extent of their vocabulary tonight.

Mr. McClellan: No, I believe in the process.

Mrs. Campbell: Overnight and over a year are two different things.

Mr. McClellan: It is being enlarged by the word process.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I think, Mr. Speaker, that the only other remaining concern that has been expressed was that raised by the member for Sarnia. It was touched upon as well by the member for St. George and it relates to the establishment of the board. As the hon. members are probably aware, we have more than one board dealing with services which previously existed in different ministries.

In moving in the direction of consolidation, co-ordination and consistency in terms of services—and also I suppose in terms of trying to meet the objectives in which the honourable members have been expressing interest in terms of reducing the numbers of agencies, boards and commissions—we are reducing the number of agencies, boards and commissions because it certainly does meet our objective in this ministry, and particularly this division, of providing that kind of consistency. There will be one board which will be referred to as the Children’s Services Review Board to supplant or replace the more numerous boards which have existed in serving the function of reviewing licensing appeals and dealing with matters of standards.

PROVINCIAL COURTS AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. Norton moved second reading of Bill 119, An Act to amend the Provincial Courts Act.

Mr. Blundy: I realize this bill is a companion bill of all the other bills which we are discussing tonight for the amalgamation of children's services, but when you see a bill entitled An Act to amend the Provincial Courts Act, Mr. Speaker, it gives you a little time to think and wonder about it. When you read some of the titles down the side of the bill—"observation and detention homes", is one that I have underlined; "superintendent to have care and custody and control"; and further on down "warrant to apprehend child"—it all sounds pretty desperate. It almost sounds like occupation of some power in the services of children. I know that I am being facetious; I know these things are all necessary. I also know they are very serious matters.

This bill doesn't give very much information about how it fits into all the other bills that are going with the amalgamated services, we are going to have to just put our trust and our hope in the ministry. Sometimes we wonder about the wisdom of doing that, but we are going to have to put our trust and our hope in the minister and his officials that when we are studying all of this conglomeration of bills we will have a great deal more information as to the effect of the bill, the regulations of the bill and the standards thereunder.

With those few short observations I suggest that we do give approval on second reading of the bill, with the view to further consideration in committee.

Mr. McClellan: I am happy to support Bill 119 without really any comment. I have some apprehension, which I raised during the discussion of the Child Welfare Act, over whether observation and detention homes ought to be used as the place of safety under protection and apprehension. I will want to pursue that.

I am not sure about the relationship, really. This is a question that needs to get sorted out, for me at least; whether there ought to be any place that is an observation and detention home apart from by route of judicial order.

My inclination is—and I have had some discussion with the member for St. George, who has compelling arguments on the other side—that observation and detention homes should only admit or discharge children by judicial order and that we should not confuse criminal procedures with the dictates of treatment.

Mrs. Campbell: All I want, with reference to this bill, is to seek a clarification from the minister on the relationship of this bill, as an amendment to the Provincial Courts Act, inso far as the appearance of the child before the court is concerned. I take it that notwithstanding the changeover of responsibility to him for the observation and detention centre, the Provincial Courts Act itself will still govern the appearance of the child to ensure that no child is held in detention without the usual practice of immediate appearances before the court. That is all I wanted to ask on this particular bill.

Hon. Mr. Norton: My responses will be equally brief; but I shall try to address the concerns that were raised by the honourable members opposite.

First of all, the overall intent here is to deal only with the control of the observation and detention home itself. As members may understand, previously most of the observation and detention homes were under the observation of the court. The problem we were faced with in many instances was that there was a lack of consistency across the province, there was not a centrally required standard and the standards varied quite dramatically across the province.

It is with a view to providing those kinds of standards for all observations and detention homes under a co-ordinated approach from the ministry that we are proposing to take over the operation of the observation and detention homes.

I would assure the honourable members, whoever expressed the concern about the admission of young people to observation and detention homes, that section 21(a) relating to the admission to and discharge from observation and detention homes quite clearly indicates that no child shall be admitted to or discharged from an observation and detention home except by order of the judge of a provincial court.

Mr. McClellan: Doesn't that conflict with the Child Welfare Act?

Mr. T. P. Reid: They also have to have those facilities available.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Perhaps that requires some further clarification, but clearly the intention of the Child Welfare Act is not to incarcerate or to detain children in a closed, locked facility. In some communities, as a matter of fact, there has been a shortage of places of safety. It came to my attention shortly after coming to this ministry, and shortly after having responsibility for training schools, that on a few rare occasions, in one particular community, a judge had ordered a child placed in a training school as a place of safety. We immediately put a stop to that.

There are observation and detention homes which are not closed, locked facilities. In fact, in one community where there was a lack of such a facility, we have recently entered into a contractual arrangement with a well established and reputable group home setting, part of which we have contracted for use as an observation and detention home.

I don't want members to get the impression that, because there is some reference under the Child Welfare Act, it is the equivalent of placing a child under lock and key, although under the proposals which we will have an opportunity to discuss more fully in committee, in terms of level of care and for levels of security that might be necessary, given the specific needs of a child in a given period of time, there will be different levels of security initially in those communities where it is possible to offer that standard of service.

Mr. Blundy: There are some communities there are no levels of security.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Norton: That is correct, and that is one of the things we are trying to address in our priorities as established and announced in this House earlier this year. One of the areas where the greatest deficiencies exist at the present time, of course, is northern Ontario; and that can be broken down in subgroups, if you wish, in that there are certain groups of our population, particularly native and francophone children, who in some areas have been underserved in terms of services available.

We are trying to address that matter in terms of our priorities that I established in terms of allocating additional funds. I don't pretend it is something that is going to be redressed completely during this fiscal year, but we have made a start and substantial sums of money, which were not available previously, have been allocated towards that end during this fiscal year.

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Speaker, it was important, to me at least, that I got an answer to my question as to the appearance of the child before the court if the child has been picked up in an emergency situation and taken to a detention home. As it stood, that child had to be before a judge at least the following morning. I do not see, with this kind of reference, that protection. I just wanted to be assured that, because the detention facility now comes under ComSoc, that child's right to be before the court immediately would not be denied.

Hon. Mr. Norton: It is certainly not the intention that this would be denied, and I think at this point I am able to assure the honourable member there is nothing changed in the act that should have any impact on that. But I will double-check, because the last thing I would want to do is to deny that right to a child under those circumstances.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered for standing social development committee.

DAY NURSERIES ACT

Hon. Mr. Norton moved second reading of Bill 120, An Act to revise the Day Nurseries Act.

Mr. McClellan: This is the bill I am most anxious to have before us in committee so we can have a full discussion and good hearings. I hope very much we can amend the Day Nurseries Act to eliminate some of the more obvious problems confronting the daycare movement in this province.

I've spoken many times on day care since I was elected. I feel more strongly about day care, I think, than about any other social service. I welcome the opportunity to say some of those things again here tonight.

I think day care in Ontario is facing the worst time it has faced since the now infamous Birch attack on quality day care in this province in 1974. I think the cumulative effect of this government's social services restraint program has been focused, whether deliberately as part of an unemployment strategy or whether just through sheer clumsiness, on daycare services. There is no doubt at all that day care in this province is suffering, and is suffering very badly.

The ministry, the government and more particularly the Provincial Secretary for Social Development (Mrs. Birch), and the previous incumbent of the present minister's portfolio (Mr. J. A. Taylor), have expressed on numerous occasions an attitude toward day care which betrays a basic hostility to the very notion. The member for Prince Edward-Lennox, in his social philosophy was a simple Neanderthal; a kind of latterday purveyor of chicken soup and dusting off your neighbours by way of being helpful.

The Provincial Secretary for Social Development is a lot more sophisticated. She basically has the same chicken-soup-dusting-the-neighbours approach to social development policy, but if we're sophisticated in 1978, we call that radical non-intervention. Lots of people write learned tomes about radical non-intervention. As far as one can tell, it still is the basic social philosophy underlying this government's attitude to the provision of social services. Nowhere is that clearer than in the daycare field.

It is absolutely intolerable that applicants for day care subsidy in this province are forced to go, in Metropolitan Toronto and in many other municipalities, to the welfare office to fill out the minister's form seven, which is the most, as I have said before, degrading and humiliating means test still in use in this jurisdiction. It is degrading to have to go to the George Street welfare office and stand or wait in line for hours and then be subjected to the prying, snooping—and very often arrogant prying—of some public servant, and to bare one's entire private business to get a daycare subsidy.

That is a simple deterrent; that's all that is. It's a deterrent to the utilization of day care. A lot of people simply will not put themselves through that kind of humiliation. As a result, they forgo getting a daycare subsidy. I know that's a reality. It's particularly a reality in a community like mine where there are many thousands of new Canadians who will not go to a welfare office under any circumstances. They just simply won't go there, let alone for a daycare subsidy.

The ministry has always said there is adequate day care in this province, that there is no need for additional day care and that the majority of families in Ontario make their own private arrangements. The ministry had always said up until this year that it was absolutely convinced that the majority of people were quite satisfied to make their own private arrangements.

We have, fortunately, had a series of reports by Project Child Care, the social planning council's day-care study, which has put the lie to that mythology. The reality is that the majority of families who are using — what would you call it? — informal home daycare arrangements, by leaving their kids with a neighbour up the street or a relative, and who make their own informal arrangements for child care would prefer to have group care. That's the simple reality.

When we look at the folks who are providing unsupervised private child care in Metropolitan Toronto, we find some enormous problems, as the study did in the report, Taking Care. Twenty-two per cent of the private child care givers had major health problems. There's an enormous problem of the simple quality of the arrangements. I quote from the report: "Like the pre-packaged instant macaroni and cheese dinners that so many of the care-givers reported serving to their charges, their program seems to lack enrichment and variety.

Some of the children in these programs spend up to 25 per cent of their time being cared for by the television set."

This is what the government has been passing off to us for the last decade or so as quality day care in Ontario. This is what the government has been telling us the people of Ontario want. We're going to pay the price for that. There's no way that one can abandon children to inadequate child care provisions and not pay the price. We will pay the price as a community and as a society in the damage that is done to children and to families because we were so concerned about constraints and restraints and because we were so concerned about making political capital out of outmoded social philosophies and out of outmoded ideologies.

The reality is that the family in our society is under a kind of siege and pressure that is unparalleled in human history. It really is. It does nobody any good for the government spokesman to go through an exercise, such as we witnessed last month with Family Unity Month, in which the government piously beats its breast and says, "We must all cherish and respect and embrace the family" and then leaves it to its own devices, to sink or swim on its own.

The reality is that the modern nuclear family is isolated and vulnerable. In some respects if one looks at the incidence of family breakdown, if one looks at the growth of single-parent families on social assistance rolls, one is justified in having great alarm and concern about the stability of the family; one is justified in coming to the conclusion that extraordinary support is needed to nurture the family in the kind of society we live in. One of the ways of saying we are serious about supporting the family, about helping mothers and fathers to stay together and to raise their children successfully is to provide adequate child care services and among those pre-eminently is quality day care.

Day care has a twofold significance for us. It is as I have said, first of all, the preventive social service par excellence. It is the service that can serve to alleviate an enormous amount of stress, both on single-parent mothers and on two-parent families.

Secondly, it is the only instrument of social policy that is available to ensure equal participation of women in the work force. That is the simple reality for us to accept. We don't have a choice about that. It's a reality that has to be accepted.

The government can make nostalgic statements about a different age and a different era, but those times are not with us. A refusal to come to terms with the reality of the aspiration of women for equal participation and equal opportunity in the work force is a recipe for social tragedy. And yet that is a course that the government continues to pursue.

Rather than expanding the base of quality group day care in Ontario, the government in the last two or three years has chosen to do what I have called "welfarize" the daycare programs. We can read about this in the program and resource summary of the 1978-79 estimates where the policy is stated very clearly. The daycare expansion and service is seen as something that is provided for specific groups of disadvantaged people.

This is a terrible mistake. If the government provides day care as a welfare service it is going to stigmatize it. That is a reality that has been borne out in innumerable programs in jurisdictions all over the world. If it provides service for people who are already damaged, who are already suffering and who already have problems, it becomes a kind of ghettoized service. People who are not poor are not eligible for subsidization. That's the reality in Ontario today. You have to be virtually impoverished to get a subsidy. The priority goes to people who have problems.

Normal, working, two-parent families of low and moderate incomes are excluded from the subsidization process, so day care in this province is increasingly becoming welfarized and stigmatized and ghettoized.

I have talked to a number of day-care facilities across the province. The reality is that normal, two-parent, working families are withdrawn from day-care programs for two reasons. They are increasingly ineligible for subsidization and there is a bias in the program towards serving populations with special needs. If we have learned anything in the last 20 years in social developments it is that is not the way to provide social service. It is certainly not the way to go about organizing and providing day-care services. There is a necessity to provide special services for special need groups, for example, for the developmentally handicapped. But they don't need to be segregated in all instances from the normal population. The poor do not need to be separated from low-income and average working families. Single-parent families do not need to be singled out from two-parent families. We don't need to set up these kinds of distinctions and discriminations in this province in any sector, especially not in child care or day care.

What good does it serve to do this? The only rationale is the dollar and cents rationale. The only rationale is to save funds. The only rationale is the refusal to accept responsibility for providing adequate child care. As I said, we will pay and we will pay dearly for the money that this government is saving today in child care costs.

I am more anxious to have the hearings on this legislation than on any of the bills that are before us. What I hope we can achieve—and I say this to my colleague from Sarnia and his colleagues in the Liberal Party—is some amendments that will do at least a couple of things. One is that we move the child-staff ratio standards from the regulations to the act, so that never again will we experience the threat that was posed by this government in 1974 to raise the staff-child ratio to a level that would have destroyed quality day care in this province.

We have only to look at the province of Alberta which has done precisely what the Provincial Secretary for Social Development (Mrs. Birch) and Mini-Skools wanted us to do in Ontario in 1974. They did it just last month. The danger remains and the pressures are there. The pressures have surfaced, in this city and the Metro social services committee, to destroy adequate child-staff ratios.

Regardless of the intentions of the present minister, we need to try to change the legislation so that kind of thing can't happen again. We need to try to change the legislation so that provisions are moved again from the regulations to the act so the kind of degrading and humiliating means testing that takes place under form seven and which requires applicants for day-care subsidy to go to the welfare office is abolished. I believe we can do that through amendments, by putting the subsidization process clearly into the act and by setting out specifically what kind of procedure we wish to use for the determination of eligibility for day-care subsidization.

We have learned over the years, and most successfully in the GAINS program, that we don't have to subject people to humiliation in order to determine their eligibility for social service support. In the GAINS program we have a self-declaration which elderly people administer themselves; that is to say, they have a form which they fill out and put in the mailbox. The ministry processes it and determines whether they are eligible or not for GAINS. There is no reason why daycare subsidization should not be provided on exactly the same basis. It is simply intolerable that, despite the fact that we raise this year after year, the minister refuses to act on this and continues to force women and families to choose between a subsidy and humiliation.

I have one other concern that I want to raise briefly, if the minister is paying attention. I realize it is taxing for him to try to pay attention.

There are provisions in the legislation which would authorize private home day care agencies to operate and which would license private home day-care agencies in this province. I'm supportive of the expansion of private home day care, but I have enormous concern about the measure that the minister is introducing here. The minister is not talking about private home day care as a satellite of a group day-care centre. The minister seems to be talking about private, entrepreneurial home day-care operations which, I assume, would be operated on a business basis.

Mr. Blundy: What's wrong with that?

Mr. McClellan: I refer to the 1975 report of the advisory council on day care which discussed private home day care and made recommendations to the ministry at that time. Their recommendation on page 41 of their final report, was that private home day care should be encouraged as a satellite program to group day care. They suggested further that some pilot projects should be undertaken to demonstrate private home day care as a satellite program to parent co-ops. They repeated that recommendation again in 1976.

We will have some discussion during the hearings, I know, on private home day care. But I'm not prepared to support that section of the legislation which provides that private home day-care agencies can be established without any reference to existing or new group day-care facilities. That would be enormously dangerous. I know of a certainty that we'll get good representation from the day-care community and I hope we can amend the legislation to make the provision of private home day care more possible, but on the basis of a link with group day-care centres so that the full resources of the day-care centre and day-care staff can be made available to those who are providing day care in their own homes.

I thank the Speaker and the House for their indulgence. I've gone on at some length.

Mr. Conway: It has been considerable.

Mr. McClellan: I'm sorry if it has. I hadn't thought you were listening too carefully, Sean.

Mr. Conway: I've listened to your every word.

Mr. McClellan: Good.

As I said, I feel very deeply about this subject. I hope very sincerely that on this issue, and particularly on the issue of the Child Welfare Act, the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party can work very closely and amend the legislation so we can turn around what this government has been doing and, in fact, undo some of the damage that has been done to child care services by this government over the last three and a half years.

Mr. Blundy: Mr. Speaker, I rise to support on second reading Bill 120, An Act to revise the Day Nurseries Act. There is really a great deal of interest being expressed in the amendments to the Day Nurseries Act. I have had a lot of comments and questions on it.

In today's society day care is so essential. In the economic conditions where both parents are working and where we have many single-parent families, the provision of adequate and good day care is very essential.

I would like to mention a couple of situations. When I was mayor of Sarnia, we had occasion to take advantage of the rather generous grants. I would like to let the present Minister of Community and Social Services know how generous his former colleagues were in the matter of day care.

Mr. McClellan: By comparison?

Mr. Blundy: Yes, by comparison this minister is a real piker. When I was mayor, the city of Sarnia took advantage of the day-care grants at that time and established a municipal day-care centre which is actually an example for people to see.

Mr. McClellan: That is true; he is cheap.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Times are changing.

Mr. Blundy: I would like the minister to come and see it. I think it's a great program. It's a great building and it has a wonderful staff. The parents are involved and volunteers are involved. It is caring for upwards of 60 children in a very well organized group day-care centre.

That was back in the days when the provincial government was living high, spending like a drunken sailor and not worrying about deficits or anything else. It was just spending money. That's what they did and, thank God, we took advantage of it, profited by it and got something for the city of Sarnia in that regard.

Mr. McClellan: Bring back Rene Brunelle.

Mr. Blundy: The present minister is a real piker when it comes to providing these services for the various areas of the province of Ontario. We have now recently established in our municipality a private group daycare centre known as St. Bartholomew's Centre. It is patterned very much after the municipal daycare centre of which I've just spoken. It is providing wonderful care for about 50 children of working parents or single parents in our community on a daily pay basis.

We have to come down to the fact that everybody is not able to afford private group daycare services. I would like to exhort the minister to try to rustle up more funds for the provision of daycare centre activities for those who are not able to pay the going rate in private group daycare centres.

Mr. Foulds: Don't nickel and dime next time.

Mr. McClellan: Spend the $44 million you were given.

Hon. Mr. Norton: You can't believe everything you say, surely.

Mr. Blundy: As I said before when I was speaking on these bills, there isn't anybody in this House who has expressed the view more often than I have that we've got to cut down on expenses, but when you're talking about children and day care and the provision of services to these needy people, it's pretty hard to talk about trying to meet restraints and trying to live with cutbacks and so forth.

I wanted to say that I can see the value of well-operated day-care facilities for the people of our municipalities. I want to exhort the minister to look at it in a very generous sense.

When we come to the study in committee of this bill, along with the other children's bills, I'm certainly going to spend some time in discussing the possibilities that are available in the provision of daycare services for the children in Ontario. With those few words I wish to give my support to this bill on second reading and I look forward to being able to make further observations and suggestions in committee.

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Speaker, earlier this evening I referred to the package and used the word "garbage," and I think this particular bill indicates what I was talking about. I go back to the days of the discussions with the Provincial Secretary for Social Development and the attitude towards day care, and I had hoped that this would be a great opportunity for this minister to at least indicate some new philosophy in this area.

The secretary has consistently taken the position that day care could be safely relegated to grandparents who had nothing better to do. If one talks to grandparents, I think there aren't too many of them who would feel qualified to deal with children on a day-to-day basis for any great period of time. There are undoubtedly some who are exceptional grandparents, but the whole concept of day care and the need of the child, particularly in a situation as complex as our society, is one which merits something more than is contained in this piece of legislation.

The whole concept for at least group day care of an early learning process is one which I think has to be examined. I want to warn the minister that when this matter goes to the committee, we will expect that philosophy, or at least a philosophy, to be presented and that we are not dealing with some revamped stuff that has all the appearance of all that which has gone before.

We have had so much discussion recently about discrimination, but I can only think it has to be a male logic that looks at the day-care situation from the point of view of eligibility. Let me just draw this example: Everyone in our society is concerned with people finding opportunities for employment; I don't think one can deny this is government policy. Everyone is concerned about making it possible for people to move out into the employment market. Yet, under our present standards and our present terms of eligibility, the people who are on unemployment insurance benefits are required to pay the full cost of placing a child in day care. Of course, since they can't afford it, one wonders what we are trying to achieve if at the same time another level of government is telling them that to be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits they have to go out and find a job.

I don't think anyone other than some of the males in our society would find that had any logic at all; and I say that with the greatest degree of concern, since most of the women with whom I have discussed it find no logic in it at all. I have to say neither do I.

We really don't look at day care either from the point of view of the needs of the child or of the needs of those who are seeking employment. We tend to look at it as though it were some kind of a begrudging privilege that we accord to those who can't really afford the full benefit of the program.

I would have to say that from my point of view, this particular bill is one of the most important of the whole package, and that I regret exceedingly the fact that again we are dealing with legalities, we are dealing with some legal semantics, but we are not dealing in any way, shape or form with a new look or a new philosophy.

I personally hate to pass this bill for committee because I do think it needs a greater debate on second reading, but I recognize that this government always functions on the basis of bringing in its important legislation at the 11th hour so it can't have ample debate in principle.

In any event I trust that the minister is warned that we will expect a statement of principle and policy to accompany this particular bill as it goes to committee.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Touching upon a couple of the latter points first, I must again remind the honourable member that we are looking at interim and short-term amendments. She can look as sceptical as she is able to—and I am sure this does sound repetitious—but I am working with senior advisers in this area on the development of a new statement or philosophy relating to day care. Whether or not that will be available and have received policy approval and so on by the time the committee sits, I don't know.

If the member had paused for a moment to be realistic and had shown some appreciation for the myriad threads of activity and progress that are going on in my ministry at the present time—

Mr. McClellan: You've turned it into a sink.

Hon. Mr. Norton: —and trying to bring these together in a co-ordinated fashion, then she really should—

Mrs. Campbell: Show us.

Hon. Mr. Norton: All right, the member will see it.

The thing is it is not going to be possible always to please the member at every point with precisely what it is she wants to see in terms of the philosophy and so on. I cannot assure her at this point that the timing will be such as to coincide with the sitting of the committee. If that is possible, I certainly will strive to meet that objective.

Referring to the 11th hour allegation, however that may be perceived by the honourable member as having been a pattern or not, I can assure her—and I think she appreciates that as well—that to get this legislation before the House during this sitting as I made a commitment to the House to do, required an extraordinary effort on the part of the staff of the ministry. Given the consultation process that we have been through, having processed over 126 submissions, many of them very substantial, it has not been a hasty process.

It would have been very easy for me to abdicate the commitment and say we'll do it in the fall when we have more time before the rising of the House, although I felt that the commitment I had made took precedence over that alternative decision.

I am not sure that some of the comments relate particularly to the principle of this bill but I find it difficult to resist commenting upon some of them. The member for Bellwoods speaks of the lack of commitment to day care in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Foulds: He is absolutely right.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I would remind him, although it may not coincide with his expectations, that it would be well to bear in mind that at a time when federal statistics recently published in the newspapers indicated that across the whole of this country there has been an average decline in the number of spaces in day care, including the situation in the province of Ontario; Ontario continues annually to increase. It may not be at the rate that he would say would be necessary.

Mr. McClellan: The minister should be ashamed and humiliated by those kinds of figures.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I look at some of the data that periodically appears in reports in the press. I try to confirm it to the best of my ability. Recently there was a suggestion of in excess of 600 people on waiting lists. I have attempted to confirm that to the best of our ability at this point. It is not complete and I am not suggesting that this is a final tally, but to the best of our ability at this point we have been able to confirm 49. It may well be larger than that. This was with respect to a specific geographical area and not the whole province.

Mr. McClellan: That speaks to the minister's incompetence.

Hon. Mr. Norton: This was related to the Toronto situation. The problem we will always have as legislators is determining what the most equitable way is to deal, not only with services like day care but services generally, which require extraordinary commitments in some instances of funds from taxpayers of the province in order to provide needed and necessary subsidies to service to other individuals.

The absence of some reasonable mechanism for testing the need, it seems to me, could potentially create an inequity the other way. We have to bear in mind that there are people almost equally in need as families in this province to make the services possible. There has to be some mechanism—

Mr. McClellan: Then why shouldn't they be eligible for subsidy? Who can afford the full cost of day care?

Hon. Mr. Norton: Come on now; that is nonsense to say why not give them a subsidy. Why don't you give everybody a subsidy?

Mr. Foulds: Why not?

Hon. Mr. Norton: If we could tax some of the member's expenditures, then maybe we would be able to create some revenues here.

Mr. Foulds: Don't be so silly. The government hasn't raised the tax from the Crown Timber Act since 1968. Don't talk such frivolous nonsense.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Coming back to the issue at hand, it is important if we are to be responsible to all of the people of the province of Ontario that we not abdicate completely the recognition of the need to test the need for a subsidy.

Mr. McClellan: Nobody denies that.

Hon. Mr. Norton: If there are ways in which it can be more equitable or reasonable or simply administered, certainly we are prepared to consider that but I am not prepared to abdicate that principle of assuring those people who are—

Mr. McClellan: Nobody suggested that. Don't be stupid.

Hon. Mr. Norton: If the member has changed his position, I welcome that because his party's position has consistently been for free universal day care. He knows that, so he should not try denying it.

Mr. McClellan: I haven't changed my position. It is the same as it was in 1975 and it is on the record.

Hon. Mr. Norton: He has stood and his party stood in principle for free and universal day care. Do not deny it. All I am saying is that I think that although we have to ensure a degree of accessibility, we have to recognize degrees of need, with the recognition that there are not unlimited resources.

Ms. Gigantes: You are borrowing on kids' lives. That is what you are doing and you are going to have to pay for it.

Hon. Mr. Norton: We must try to meet the need of those in greatest need first.

Mr. McClellan: You make Margaret Birch look progressive.

Hon. Mr. Norton: That may be so. I'm saying that—

Mr. Foulds: Do you know the play, Joan of Arc? The last line of that play is, "How long do we have to wait, Lord, how long?"

Hon. Mr. Norton:—there is not the philosophical and moral bankruptcy as there is in some of the opinions that have been expressed from time to time, not necessarily tonight, in the area of social services.

Ms. Gigantes: That is a kind of meaningful statement, isn't it? A timely statement.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Yes. I would point out to the honourable member that if she cares—

Ms. Gigantes: I wonder if I could rise on a point of personal privilege?

Hon. Mr. Norton:—to once more accuse me of lying in public and have it published—I have already a legal opinion with respect to the liability she incurred the last time—in the Ottawa publication. Please bear that in mind. I don't take it lightly. I also have transcripts of the tapes.

Mr. Acting Speaker: The member for Carleton East on a point of privilege.

Ms. Gigantes: The minister has referred to a question of my personal liability. I'm interested to know exactly what he means by that and what tapes he is referring to.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I'm quite happy to respond to that. It's not particularly relevant to the conversation. I apologize for the suggestion. But I would point out I have seen a publication in which the honourable member purported to quote me on a matter relating to day care, then make the statement she knew that to be a lie. That was a day-care publication in Ottawa. I've forgotten the name of it. I have a copy of it.

I would also point out I have seen what purports to be a transcript—

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order. Does the member for Carleton East have a further point of privilege?

Ms. Gigantes: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you would consider it a matter of unparliamentary procedure for the minister in effect to accuse me of lying by the words he has spoken right now.

Mr. Foulds: He has to withdraw that remark.

Hon. Mr. Norton: The point of the matter is that the honourable member accused me—and was quoted in a public publication—of lying. That's the point to which I was referring.

If she wishes to pursue the matter further I invite her to do so. I suggest we might carry on with this legislation this evening and we can deal with that at another point, if she wishes.

Ms. Gigantes: Mr. Speaker, I would like a ruling on this. It seems to me quite intolerable that the minister should introduce an interjection of this kind in a debate on this bill and that he should be suggesting I have incurred a personal liability to him; that he has tapes; that he has information that somehow makes me vulnerable to a lawsuit, I presume. What is this and what is your opinion of it?

Mr. Acting Speaker: What the minister referred to did not take place in this House. The minister did not accuse the honourable member of lying. The minister indicated he saw a publication in which the honourable member accused him of lying. I believe the minister did indicate there might be some liability on the part of the member and then the minister withdrew that statement. I would now ask the minister to proceed to discuss the bill before us.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I didn't accuse anyone of lying. There perhaps ought to be some further clarification. I did not retract, sir, the suggestion that I had sought legal opinion on the matter and received such opinion.

Mr. Acting Speaker: I believe, Mr. Minister, you did retract—

Mr. Foulds: What the heck is going on here?

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order. Mr. Minister, I believe you did retract the statement that there may be some liability on the part of the honourable member for the moment. I think you did retract that statement.

Mrs. Campbell: He said he didn't.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, I—

Some hon. members: Retract.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I can't—

Mr. Acting Speaker: Any statement you made as far as seeking legal opinion goes is perfectly in order. As for saying there is liability on the part of the member, did you or did you not withdraw that statement?

Hon. Mr. Norton: I will withdraw any reference to that, but I did receive such an opinion and I will make no references as to what that opinion informed me of.

Mr. Martel: A point of privilege: If the minister is making some reference that there is a possibility, I think he should have to either substantiate or withdraw totally. He cannot say he's got something that might indicate what he's saying. He's either going to produce it or he's going to withdraw totally.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order. I would point out to the member for Sudbury East that not in any way have his privileges been abused.

Mr. Martel: I'm not suggesting that my privileges have been, my colleague is.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Very well.

Mr. Martel: The minister will withdraw the suggestion totally or he will produce the evidence. He'll do one of the two.

An hon. member: Let her speak for herself.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Would you please take your seat?

Mr. Martel: No, Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect, I cannot leave that inuendo about a member of this Legislature.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order, order. The honourable minister, I will repeat again, has referred to matters which did not take place in this House. The honourable minister has indicated he has received some legal opinions and there is no breach of privilege in that.

The honourable minister mentioned that in a publication the member for Carleton East has said that the minister had lied. That could be a point of privilege on behalf of the minister, but certainly not for the member for Carleton East unless she says that statement is incorrect.

Mr. Breithaupt: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the point of privilege, it would appear to me that the minister, through the allegations he has made—

Mr. Foulds: He threatened her.

Mr. Breithaupt: —is in some way perhaps compromising the abilities of the member for Carleton East to make certain comments on certain items before the House because of presumed other matters which are hanging over her head in that sense. It would seem to me that our privileges are all somewhat coloured in this matter if, in fact, the minister is using some comments—

Mr. Mackenzie: That's a cheap slur that you used. It's about the worst I've heard in this House.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I am accused of lying and that is a cheap slur?

Mr. Breithaupt: —on some other matter to interfere perhaps with a free exchange of opinions and perhaps to compromise the member for Carleton East—

Mr. McClellan: He is not the first one who has done that.

Mr. Breithaupt:—in her ability to bring forward points of view of criticisms or whatever that may be in order. It just seems to me a most curious exchange which the minister began. I don't understand the background because I'm not familiar with the article that was raised.

Mr. Lane: No, you were here.

Mr. Ashe: Sit down.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Breithaupt: But I'm quite sure that the member for Durham West knows even less about it than I do.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order, please. I would point out again to the House—

Mr. Roy: He knows nothing about nothing.

Mr. Acting Speaker:—that the matter referred to was not a matter which took place in this House.

An hon. member: He still threatened her.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Just a moment. And therefore, in no way would it inhibit any member of this House from participating in their duties in this House.

Secondly, the only matter which may be considered to be a matter which is privileged and should be withdrawn was the allegation by the minister that there might be some liability on the part of the member for Carleton East. My understanding was that the minister did withdraw that reference in this House this evening.

Mr. Breithaupt: No, he didn't. He said he didn't.

Mrs. Campbell: No, he didn't.

Mr. Martel: Would you ask him to withdraw it clearly?

Mr. Acting Speaker: I understand the minister did withdraw the reference to liability on the part of the member, and if he's done that, then I think the matter is concluded.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I didn't, Mr. Speaker. I simply said that I have received a legal opinion.

Mr. Martel: No, but you in fact have not withdrawn it.

Mr. Acting Speaker: I think we should continue with the debate.

Mr. Foulds: On a point of order: I draw to your attention rule 16, subsection 8; which says that "In a debate, a member will be called to order by the Speaker if he makes allegations against another member." That is what that member has done against the member for Carleton East. He should have been called to order and he should withdraw the remark.

Mr. Martel: Totally.

Hon. Mr. Drea: He withdrew it.

Mr. Acting Speaker: On the point of order, I will say again—the only allegation, and the member for Carleton East has not claimed this to be a false allegation—the only thing the minister said that could be considered to be an allegation was that she said somewhere in print that the honourable minister's statement was a lie. If she wishes to contest that statement, that's an allegation, that can be contested. But she did not contest that statement.

Mr. Foulds: The rule is "makes allegations" of any kind. The member cannot do that.

Mr. Acting Speaker: I will hear only the member for Carleton East if she wishes to rise on a point of privilege—only.

Ms. Gigantes: I am sure that any comment that I made about the behaviour or a statement of the minister was an accurate description of his behaviour or his statements.

An hon. member: You're evading.

Ms. Gigantes: Whether he considers that to be something over which he goes to a lawyer is of course his business. But when he makes an allegation in this House that I have somehow committed some kind of civil crime against his person—

Hon. Mr. Norton: I didn't suggest that.

[10:15]

Ms. Gigantes: Yes, you did suggest that, excuse me, Mr. Minister. Mr. Speaker, that's exactly what he suggested when he suggested he had sought legal advice as to what I am alleged to have said. I will have to check the record very carefully. I think the onus rests with him to bring proof of anything.

Mr. G. Taylor: Prove your privilege now; don't bother checking.

Ms. Gigantes: He is suggesting that I engaged in some kind of actionable civil crime. I think that allegation should be withdrawn.

Mr. Martel: That's right.

Mr. Acting Speaker: I think we have had enough on this—

Mr. Martel: Make him withdraw; we've had enough.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order. The member for Carleton East has not in any way denied anything that the minister said as far as her statements are concerned.

Mr. Martel: Why should she?

Mr. Mackenzie: Come off it. She's not on trial here.

Mr. Acting Speaker: There is no point of privilege on that at the moment.

Mr. Foulds: You won't get another piece of legislation through if you keep up this stuff.

Mr. Ashe: What's new?

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order. Would you please take your seat?

Mr. Mackenzie: We haven't dealt with slurs before, and that was a cheap slur on the member.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order. The honourable minister has withdrawn the allegation that there may be liability on the part of the member for Carleton East. That ends the matter. I would ask the honourable minister to continue on the debate on the bill.

Mr. Martel: We will challenge your ruling, I am telling you.

An hon. member: He hasn't withdrawn it.

Ms. Gigantes: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege again: What your ruling is suggesting is that, unless I challenge the minister's imputation that I have slandered him, I am somehow agreeing to the fact that I have slandered him.

Mr. Martel: That's nonsense.

Mr. Acting Speaker: The honourable minister has withdrawn that part of his remarks.

Mr. Martel: He has not.

Mr. Cooke: He did not withdraw it.

Mr. Acting Speaker: If there is a dispute, I will ask the honourable minister again if he has withdrawn that part of his remarks about the liability of the member for Carleton East.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Mr. Speaker, if it would be more appropriate to pursue in another place, I will withdraw the entire thing in order that the business of the House may continue.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Will the honourable minister continue with his summary of Bill 120?

Mr. Blundy: Make it brief.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I will try to make my remaining remarks very brief.

I was making reference, I believe, to the question of testing; and I will pass on now to some of the statements that have been made with respect to group day care as opposed to private home day care. I think that some of our assumptions—and I say "our assumptions," because I think we have all made them, those of us who have been involved in the provision of day care; I do include myself in that group, having been involved for a number of years in a charitable group that was providing day care on a non-profit basis.

Some of our assumptions may well be being challenged. If we are going to make some of the sweeping statements about the value of group day care, we might make sure that we are aware of at least some of the current literature in other jurisdictions relating to an evaluation of some of the effects of group day care. I am not undermining that; I am just saying there is some new literature that I think we should all be aware of. Pardon?

Ms. Gigantes: You are quite deliberately undermining it.

Mr. Acting Speaker: If the minister will ignore the interjections, I think we will not get into any more trouble.

Hon. Mr. Norton: It is not an attempt to deliberately undermine it at all. As a matter of fact, it is simply an effort on my part, and I hope an effort on the part of the members opposite, to make oneself as fully aware as possible.

Mr. McClellan: Identify the studies.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I will advise the members; I cannot tell them off the top of my head, but I will let them know if they are interested in pursuing that. This may explain some of the problems that the members opposite have about me—

Mr. McClellan: Your programs are what's wrong with you.

Hon. Mr. Norton:—in terms of the study that was done in Toronto, expressing concern about health problems but to the best of knowledge not stipulating what the nature of those were on the part of persons providing home day care. I might also add that one of the other concerns that was expressed was the level of education of the persons, I presume almost entirely women, involved in the provision of home day care. One of the observations was that they have—

Mr. McClellan: This is in the report.

Hon. Mr. Norton: This is just picking up on the member's comments on the report. One of the concerns expressed was that a number of them—I have forgotten the percentage—had grade eight education or less. Presumably that means that creates some risk for the child. That may be what happened to me. I can tell the members that I happen to have been raised by two parents, neither of whom had grade eight education. I realize that standards of education have changed over the years, but I am not sure those kinds of considerations in themselves mean that kind of delivery of day care is bad per se. I think it takes a more complete and detailed analysis than I have seen to this date.

Mr. Conway: Come on, you are being foolish.

Hon. Mr. Norton: The allegation that our interest in recognizing the need for permitting individual families to make individual decisions, wherever possible, for the provision of care for their children, be it in their own home or elsewhere—

Mr. McClellan: You must have been listening to some very strange people.

Hon. Mr. Norton: —is not a matter of restraint. The allegation that that is a matter related to restraint is fallacious.

Ms. Gigantes: Freedom of non-choice.

Hon. Mr. Norton: We must recognize that to whatever extent we are able to provide day care within this province, be it in a private home setting or in a group setting, we must always allow the opportunity for individuals to make private arrangements.

Ms. Gigantes: Oh no, we would send them in at gunpoint.

Hon. Mr. Norton: No, but this relates to one of the other concerns the member for Bellwoods expressed, and that was relating to the licensing of—

Mr. McClellan: Why don't you talk about the communist manifesto just to round out your speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. McClellan: Socialization of children.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Listen, I am simply trying to give you some correct information.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Norton: You expressed concern about private-home day-care agencies being licensed.

Mr. McClellan: This is a very high-level debate.

Hon. Mr. Norton: You expressed concern about private-home day-care agencies being licensed. That is not indicating a new thrust.

Mr. McClellan: It's your trend of thought.

Hon. Mr. Norton: The fact of the matter is there are agencies at the present time, engaged in arranging private-home day-care for individuals, on a private nonsubsidized basis, through private contractual arrangements with families.

The provision to license is simply a means of trying to ensure good standards in that kind of operation. That should not be interpreted as a major new thrust to get away from the public provision of day care. At the same time I want to reiterate, I am not disposed to try to eliminate private involvement, provided it meets high standards, in the delivery of day care.

Mr. McClellan: Like Mini-Skools.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Well, there is some misinformation on that as well.

Mr. McClellan: Could we have a little bit more information coming down the pipe?

Hon. Mr. Norton: That covers most of the concerns that have been raised, and with that I will terminate my remarks on this legislation.

Mr. McClellan: Thank God.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered for standing social development committee.

CHILDREN'S MENTAL HEALTH CENTRES ACT (concluded)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: According to the provisions of provisional order 37 I would remind the members that there will be a bell for up to 30 minutes.

Mr. Breithaupt: Could we agree that it would be a five-minute bell? Is that possible at this point?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Mr. Welch moved that the House meet at 10 a.m. on Thursday, June 22, with the routine proceedings to be called at 2 o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, starting at 10, we will do Bills 124, 131, 126 and 35 and then, one would hope, vote interim supply.

There has been some question about the committees. I would assume that the committees, could meet concurrent with the House. In fact, would there be any question about that? The House could agree that the committees that are scheduled for Thursday morning would be allowed to meet concurrent with the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

On motion by Hon. Mr. Welch, the House adjourned at 10:38 p.m.

LEGISLATURE OF ONTARIO

THURSDAY, JUNE 22, 1978

The House met at 10 a.m.

Prayers.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, perhaps by way of some explanation, I thought we might start with Bill 124. The parliamentary assistant to the Treasurer (Mr. McKeough) can't be here this morning, but will be here later on today, so we would then go to Bill 126, and hopefully find some way to accommodate Bill 35 of the Minister of Natural Resources (Mr. F. S. Miller) before noon hour, because he has to be away this afternoon.

Mr. Nixon: Busy fellow.

Hon. Mr. Welch: With some discussion with the other two House leaders, we would add Bill 19 for some consideration as well.

Mr. Nixon: Where in the list?

Hon. Mr. Welch: I think we will just put it in committee of the whole and do it at the end of all the other legislation.

RESIDENTIAL PREMISES RENT REVIEW AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. Grossman moved second reading of Bill 124, An Act to amend the Residential Premises Rent Review Act, 1975 (2nd Session).

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the bill extends the application of the rent review legislation for two months. This is something that was brought forward, not only by my colleagues in the caucus of the Liberal Party, but also from other members in the House since, because of the notice requirements in the legislation, if we did not give it this extension, there would not be adequate time in the fall, when the Legislature resumes, for us to deal with the matter without there being some dislocation and maybe even a hiatus in the application of the regulation.

We believe that the bill is necessary. The standing committee has reviewed the alternatives in rent review very thoroughly and the House has now accepted their report which, we are told by the minister, will be acted upon with dispatch and without delay and effectively when the Legislature resumes in the autumn.

Therefore this bill, being simply a stopgap measure, has our support.

Mr. Makarchuk: We will be supporting this bill as well. We recognize that it is a stop-gap measure that the minister has introduced until we can overcome the difficulties inherent in the other bill.

I would like to point out to the Legislature that this party supports rent controls and this party recognizes the fact that when the report recommends that rent controls should expire in 1980 it is really looking at a dream world. We said that when the report was being presented. We should recognize that there is no way that this province at this time is going to end rent controls. Rent controls are here to stay. The reason is that there are absolutely no initiatives on the part of that government over there to provide affordable housing for people in this province.

Mr. Havrot: Oh, come on.

Mr. Nixon: That's decided by the Legislature, not by the NDP.

Mr. Makarchuk: Until such time as we have affordable housing, we will have rent controls. It's just like market value assessment which the government keeps saying it will bring in and which it keeps putting off; it's not going to bring that in.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Of which you're in favour, of course.

Mr. Makarchuk: There is no way the government is going to cancel rent controls. I wish the minister would try to get away from this dream-world existence.

Mr. Havrot: You're living in a dream world, a fairy-tale world.

Mr. Makarchuk: We don't want to be in an "I told you so" position next year or a year and a half hence, but it appears to me that in a year and a half hence we will be going through the same exercise again. We will be coming in with another ad hoc bill extending rent controls to try to resolve the problem.

Mr. Nixon: You want it built into the constitution.

Mr. Foulds: Right. Why not?

Mr. Makarchuk: Why not? Absolutely.

Mr. McClellan: Which constitution?

Mr. Makarchuk: The new one or the old one?

We have to recognize that rent controls are here to stay and we have to try to make them work and make them work properly.

The committee's report comes to a great extent from the hearings that were held and the number of people who came to the hearings. The report does reflect some of the concerns raised in the hearings.

This party wishes to be on record that it would like to have seen the new buildings included under rent controls as well. It seems to us that under the proposals in the report, people who put up new buildings will have an opportunity to charge economic rents. Also, the tribunals—and this was part of the report—would take into account the additional costs, et cetera, that perhaps would be faced by new builders and, therefore, the builders would be entitled to charge the economic rents to ensure that they have a normal return on their costs as well as a profit. It seems to us in this party that leaving new buildings without coverage under rent controls was an unnecessary suggestion, and they should be covered.

The idea of establishing a tribunal is an excellent one. It seems to me, again, that this came out of the presentations made at the hearings. It will bring a sense of informality. The rent hearings will become open, uncomplicated. Perhaps the hearings will be held at times when people can attend them. Perhaps the legalistic complexity that surrounds the hearings at this time will be removed and we will have a much fairer operation.

We in the NDP are concerned about the fact that the tribunal will consist of only one person, as suggested by the ministry staff. It seems to us that if you have three people, one representing the tenant, one representing the landlord and a neutral party—if there is such a person—it would be a lot fairer, again, in comparison to what it is now. We had complaints from tenants in their presentations to the effect that some of the rent control officers were really defeated Tory hacks and they did not know what they were doing, they did not give reasons for their decisions and they did not take into consideration—

Mr. Speaker: I must remind the honourable member that the only thing contained in this bill is to extend the provisions of the act for a further two months.

Mr. Makarchuk: Right, Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with you. I will not discuss Tory hacks any more.

The bill arises out of the report that was provided by the committee. It is a report as a result of the green paper on rent control and, therefore, it seems to me there should be some allowance or some recognition, some discussion on where it stems from. The bill is part of the recommendations that rent controls be extended at this time, so until such time—

Mr. Speaker: But not contained in the bill.

Mr. Makarchuk: No, not contained, but implied, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McClellan: There were Tory hacks on the committee too.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Don't provoke me this morning. Let's get it over with.

Mr. Deans: The thought that you might be provoked strikes terror into our hearts.

Mr. Makarchuk: When the minister is dealing with the new legislation, and I presume he will be drafting the new legislation some time this fall, I hope the minister takes into account some of the problems that were raised at the hearings regarding the operation of rent review and the suggestion that rent controls, rent review, tenant protection and everything else be combined under one tribunal, which I think is an excellent suggestion.

I hope the minister, when he brings in this legislation, takes these matters into account. I hope he also takes into account the suggestions that the matter of arrears in rent, collection of rent, et cetera, is also to be handled by the tribunal so that the people, the landlords, particularly the small ones, do not have to go—

Mr. Speaker: The member insists on referring to something that is not in the bill so, therefore, is not a principle and not debatable.

Mr. Makarchuk: Mr. Speaker, you are quite right.

Mr. Nixon: Why don't you sit down?

Mr. Makarchuk: However, I hope the minister takes those matters into consideration.

Mr. Nixon: "However" is not in the bill either.

Mr. Makarchuk: I wish to conclude that the government has to recognize the fact that the problem is not the lack of housing, the problem is the affordability of housing and until such time as we get down to the sort of nitty-gritty—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The availability of housing is not in the bill. The member knows that. I am going to have to ask him to take his seat unless he refers to the principle of the bill, and that is the extension of the provisions of the act for a further two months.

Mr. Makarchuk: Mr. Speaker, thank you very much.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: However.

Mr. Makarchuk: However, Mr. Speaker, the bill does apply to rent control and the rent control legislation is related directly to housing, to the lack of housing, housing costs—

Mr. Nixon: Housing is related to the provincial budget, the provincial budget is related to the constitution—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Hit the gong, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Makarchuk: What I am trying to point out to the minister is that if we are going to deal with this problem adequately in the future—

Mr. Nixon: We have got that now, that is the reason the bill is here.

Mr. Makarchuk: —we will have to start looking very seriously at construction costs, we will have to start looking at things like land banking and so on, and we will be able to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, order. The honourable member for Kitchener.

Mr. Breithaupt: Mr. Speaker, I just briefly want to comment upon the situation which allows an extension of the present legislation for two months. In the report given to the House, there was, of course, a most important comment—

Mr. Deans: Which is not before the Legislature.

Mr. Breithaupt: —which called for ensuring that there would be no interruption in tenant operations. I recall only the first resolution, which was that a revised rent review program replace without interruption the current Residential Premises Rent Review Act. It was, of course, most important to those of us in committee to ensure that there would be no difficulty in the giving of notice or in the dealings between either landlords or tenants with each other so that there would be no problem ensuring that the will of the Legislature was not subverted by any uncertainty within the market for rental accommodation.

The minister has said he will clearly bring forward the view he will show in his legislation by early September, and that we will have ample time to debate the legislation, which means it will be before us, immediately upon our return, in mid-October. I would think that between mid-October and the end of November, there will be sufficient time to debate the bill. And the legislation will be in place well before the three-month notice period which would end on February 28.

I believe this is a practical way of dealing with the problem and I commend the minister for setting out a timetable that assures us that difficulties which could otherwise occur will be avoided.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I wish to reply at length to the comments made by the member for Brantford.

Mr. Kennedy: They are not in the bill.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: However, I will do it when it's in order.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Tell us about beer in the ball park instead.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You'll have to stick to the press for that.

Mr. Kerrio: There is a connection.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I want to confirm what the member for Kitchener has said. I think it's important that the House be in a position to deal with this matter early next fall so the bill can be passed in November in order to meet the 90-day notice period for the February 28 deadline.

The date admittedly was picked partly because we feel it is within our capability, at least in the government, to produce a comprehensive piece of legislation by September, and in order that we may indicate to the public what that piece of legislation will be. We hope and expect that all members of the assembly will work as hard as necessary in the early weeks of the new session, next fall, in order that, in fairness to all landlords and tenants, we may have as early passage of that new legislation as possible, but doing so with every bit of deliberation and public input that will be necessary at that time. It is a difficult piece of legislation.

Mr. Nixon: In whose judgement?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: One of the motivating factors behind today's small amending bill is, the bill which will succeed the current legislation will have many of the same elements as the existing legislation. Therefore, it becomes fairer to simply extend the current program than to ask landlords and tenants to guess what is going to happen.

We did not and still do not anticipate an enormous problem developing if nothing were done, but the two schemes coincide so much—

Mr. Nixon: That guessing business was plan one, was it?

Hon. Mr. Grossman:—it would be appropriate to provide some consistency and reliability to the future for everyone involved. Hence, this piece of legislation. We do look forward to some hard work in the early days of the session next fall in order to make the February 28 date practical, reasonable and effective.

Motion agreed to.

Third reading also agreed to on motion.

House in committee of the whole.

CROWN TIMBER AMENDMENT ACT

Consideration of Bill 35, An Act to amend the Crown Timber Act.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2:

Hon. F. S. Miller: I have a motion on section 2 of the bill. It was circulated to the critics.

Mr. Nixon: It must have taken a lot of printing.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Yes.

Mr. Chairman: Hon. F. S. Miller moves that sections 2 to 5 of the bill be renumbered as sections 3 to 6 and that the bill be amended by adding thereto the following section:

2. Subsection 4 of section 25 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

(4) The minister may enter into an agreement with a licensee for the promotion and maintenance of the productivity of the licensed area by establishing, regenerating and tending forests and employing silvicultural cutting systems to regenerate forests.

Mr. T. P. Reid: We discussed this matter during second reading of the bill in regard to the principle the minister is establishing hereby. We indicated at that time we were in favour and we applaud the minister's initiative in this regard.

There is one matter that does disturb me, however. I'm making an amendment to a further section, but I would also like to make an amendment to section 4 that would require the minister to table any agreements with the licensees in regard to the agreement he has for regeneration, and that these should be tabled in the Legislature during the session within 15 days of the agreement being signed or within 15 days of the new session.

I think it's important that the Legislature and the public of Ontario have access to these agreements because it's very important, as we've said for years, that forest regeneration increase and improve in Ontario. Without such an amendment and without a commitment from the minister that these agreements will be made public, it would be extremely difficult for us to know exactly what the extent of reforestation and regeneration in the province is.

We would also like to know what the format is for agreements between the minister and the various companies and whether or not the ministry itself will also continue to provide some of the regeneration in some of the licensed areas. The bottom line of all this is we want to be assured there is a higher level of regeneration going on; that the agreement between the province and the company is fair and equitable to both sides and, particularly, that we will be assured of a continuing allowable cut in the province to keep employment in the mills growing.

I think it's very important that this be done. I would like to hear from the minister whether he intends to pursue this in this way.

Hon. F. S. Miller: The willingness to produce any of the material on our part is there. My problem in giving you a carte blanche agreement that all agreements between all companies and government will be produced in public may be that some of those are of use to competitors in certain circumstances. There's always a degree of confidentiality in some kinds of agreements with private organizations. That would bother me.

We don't see any real problem with the regeneration agreements being made public. I don't foresee us not being able to make them public. I just have to put in one rider: there may be times when types of agreements we enter into may have confidential or classified information, specific to an industry, of use to its competitor. I think we have to be very cautious to maintain that trust in government that a company needs to have vis-à-vis its competitors. That is the only reason. I am satisfied anything else should be public information.

Mr. T. P. Reid: I appreciate what the minister has said, but my concern really is that everybody be given a fair shake in these matters. Quite frankly, I am a little loath to allow the minister or his predecessors—I have no problem with the present minister's honesty and integrity, but there have been some in the past and may be some in the future whose integrity and honesty we might not be quite as fully prepared to accept as the present minister's.

Hon. F. S. Miller: You might be there.

Mr. T. P. Reid: That certainly strengthens my argument, I might say.

Mr. Foulds: We certainly would have severe reservations about that.

Mr. T. P. Reid: That makes the argument right there. It seems to me that we have to guarantee to everyone who is involved in the forest industry—and basically we are talking about the 10, 11 or 12 largest companies which are going to enter into these agreements; basically those are the people we are talking about—it seems to me that while there may be odd circumstances in which special arrangements can and perhaps should be made for regeneration agreements, that in fact the agreements with each company as to the cost that is going to be paid back to the company, or the subsidy that the ministry is going to pay, or whatever range of negotiations takes place, those should as closely as possible be equal and the same for each and every company.

I would say to the minister that we are going on faith greatly already, and we indicated, both ourselves and the third party, in the principle of section 2 that we were willing to give the minister the authority to do that, but I think we would like some assurance—you haven't given us any idea of how you are going to do it—that this information, at least, is going to be available so that we can review it and discuss it in a rational manner.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Chairman, I am willing to table regeneration agreements.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Thank you.

Mr. Foulds: Mr. Chairman, first of all, I would simply like to congratulate the minister for that particular willingness because I think that is an important step forward in making things public in Ontario, and I would support the thrust of the remarks made by my colleague and friend, the member for Rainy River. He will deny that, and actually I went too far; it is just this early morning sitting.

Mr. T. P. Reid: It was a slip of the tongue.

Mr. Foulds: I think it would also be useful, not only if the agreements were tabled, but also if we had reported formally, either to the Legislature or to the committee hearing the estimates of the ministry, on an annual basis, the progress that we are making with regard to this new thrust in regeneration. After all, it will be with one or two or three companies initially, and we would like, in Ontario and in this Legislature, to monitor the progress, whether it has been successful or unsuccessful, the comparison between the success in this method and in those limits where the ministry retains responsibility. I wonder if the minister would be willing to make that formal commitment, not only on his behalf as the present minister, but also on behalf of the ministry as a matter of policy.

Hon. F. S. Miller: I am delighted to have our progress on regeneration subject to the scrutiny of this House, or of the process in the estimates. This year, as you know, we had the regeneration conference.

Mr. T. P. Reid: You haven't been too fussy about it during the estimates.

Hon. F. S. Miller: I can't guarantee that we will always have an annual regeneration conference. I can guarantee that there will be one next year. That is also a convenient forum, if it continues, for the members of the opposition to assess in a less controversial and perhaps more technical atmosphere, the progress that is really being made. I, for one, would like to make sure that both parties—
[10:30]

Mr. Nixon: You won't even take us up to the north to look at it.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Yes, that's exactly what I'm saying.

Mr. Nixon: Promises, promises.

Hon. F. S. Miller: I would like to make sure now that both parties understand they are welcome at that conference next year as participants and observers. I don't care how many members come from the respective caucuses. If, in fact, there are a number interested, I hope they come.

Mr. Nixon: What about the Brampton commitment?

Hon. F. S. Miller: In all honesty, the member will find I am not doing too badly on that.

Mr. Nixon: I hope not. It certainly—

Hon. F. S. Miller: It must be nice for the member to be able to lift his head from reading the Globe and Mail and sound so full of intelligence.

Mr. Samis: It's hard to take, eh, Mickey?

Mr. Hennessy: That's right.

Mr. Nixon: A big sigh.

Mr. Hennessy: Stand up.

Mr. Chairman Order. Is there anything further on this amendment?

Mr. Nixon: I was not reading.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Just in the spirit of the minister's remarks, has he not had a somewhat informal agreement with a timber company in northwestern Ontario along the lines he has outlined in the bill? Could he give us some indication of how he has done with that?

Hon. F. S. Miller: The kind of agreement we foresee resulting from this amended clause would be more comprehensive than anything we have done in the past. I believe the kind of "regeneration agreements" the ministry has been allowed to enter into, in the past, have generally been very restricted and narrow in scope. My staff are assuring me I'm correct in that.

Mr. T. P. Reid: No, they're not; they're talking to each other.

Hon. F. S. Miller: We are looking forward to a much broader assumption of responsibility, in effect, of those responsibilities currently held by the crown and by the crown only. As you know, we needed this to permit us to sign agreements in the interval between now and the next sitting of this House. Otherwise there would be no statutory authority for us to conclude the negotiations currently under way. I hope they result in signed agreements. They are the first of a kind and we may yet find real difficulties; but progress is good.

Mr. T. P. Reid: I have one further question, if I may, Mr. Chairman. I'm presuming the minister is considering that the province will subsidize, or pay, so much per acre to the companies for these regeneration agreements. The minister is nodding his head that this is correct.

I also presume the companies will be after the minister to provide a longer land tenure commitment so they can plan their capital budget and expansion based on that. I presume that will be part of the agreement. He nods yes to that as well.

Hon. F. S. Miller: I should qualify that. As I understand the agreements, they will be subject to the companies' adequately regenerating the areas for which they are responsible and their licence renewals would be dependent upon an audit performed by us.

Mr. Foulds: The second last remark of the minister prompts this question. He indicated that previous agreements had been rather limited. As I read the previous clause, and as I read the present clause, the real difference in technical terms that I notice is that the terms "regeneration," "tending" and "silviculture" are used. Did your legal branch indicate to you or to previous ministers that under the present phrasing, "the promotion and maintenance of the productivity of the licenced area," these specific references could not be carried out? What really puzzles me, in legal terms, is why the vague phrasing which would seem to give the authority in the previous clause was not sufficient and why you had to introduce this clause, which is, as we mentioned earlier, a new bill?

Hon. F. S. Miller: I may have a note here in a second helping me with the technical phraseology. It says here that the old agreements would not allow modified cutting. The amendment will—if I can read the handwriting—potentially allow us to have 50,000 acres of spruce covered by it.

Mr. Foulds: I'm sorry, what was that?

Mr. T. P. Reid: Whatever that means.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Okay. I know when we discussed this in my office at the time it was required, the people working on the new agreements had been in consultation with our legal staff to see whether the authority was in section 25 of the old act and they felt it was not, that some of the agreements to pay the money referred to by the member for Rainy River would not necessarily pass the scrutiny of the provincial auditor without a clarification of this section.

Mr. Foulds: Does this imply that the mechanism that you are going to be using is a direct payment back to companies with which you have agreements rather than a lessening of the dues that are established under further clauses in the bill, or is it that you could not reduce the costs, the area charges or the stumpage dues in further clauses without this section?

Hon. F. S. Miller: If you recall in the estimates debates, at least one member, or maybe more, referred to the fact that the costs of regeneration and protection in the forests often exceeded the total revenues the Crown received. Therefore, it was obvious that offset would not necessarily cover the costs incurred by companies. They will have other benefits besides the reduction of Crown dues, but reduction may not cover the total costs of the program we currently are doing. Therefore, there will be need for direct payment in a number of areas and, therefore there will be a need for authority to pay that money.

Mr. Foulds: That, of course, raises this very interesting philosophical problem between us and that is, are you saying—and I want to have this clear—that we, in fact, will be paying out of the general revenues of the province funds exceeding the revenues that we gain from individual companies, or is that a very real possibility?

Hon. F. S. Miller: Mr. Chairman, the timber revenue dues and the area charges that are collected as a result of this particular statute and the regulations under it are only a small part of the total revenues gained by governments from the forest products industry. They are an easily identifiable part, but I think one has to remember that there is a $300 million payroll in this industry, 28,000 direct jobs, plus corporate taxes, all of which flow from essentially the health of the forest.

These charges have always been exceeded. In other words, we are not intending to do something that is not currently happening. The government does spend more money directly on forests than area charges and Crown dues produce. They are, I am told, six to eight per cent of the costs of wood currently in the industry. They are deemed to be a fair raw material charge for the value of wood; that wood is processed and we also participate in the profits of processing.

Mr. Foulds: I don't want to belabour the point, and I certainly want the amendment to pass, but as I recall, however, the area charges and the revenue that we gained from the stumpage dues and so on did not pretty well match the silvicultural costs within the ministry. You are now talking about the total management costs, am I correct in that?

Hon. F. S. Miller: Yes.

Mr. Foulds: Thank you very much.

Motion agreed to.

Section 2, as amended, agreed to.

Section 3, as renumbered, agreed to.

On section 4, as renumbered:

Mr. T. P. Reid: I just have a couple of points I want to make. On section 49 of the act, under section 4, it just seems to me that there might be something somewhat unfair in these two clauses, in that people, who have been operating on the basis of what their costs were, projected and budgeted on the basis of that response. These two sections now allow the minister to change those crown dues and area charges, as of April 1 even on timber that has already been cut under previous legislation and agreement. That seems to be somewhat unfair to some of the people involved in the forest industry. Can the minister comment on that?

Hon. F. S. Miller: We gave a great deal of notice to the industry about this proposed change. In fact, the change is lower than they anticipated. They expected a 70 per cent increase in charges, and we have reduced it to 50 per cent.

Mr. T. P. Reid: So they're happy as heck.

Hon. F. S. Miller: I think they're satisfied—let's put it that way—that the charges they are currently paying, under these new regulations $41.20 per square mile retroactive to the first of April of this year, are fair.

We had a chance to discuss it through the Ontario Forest Industries Association meetings with my ministry. Of course, it is natural for industry to resent any increase in charges but when they look back across the time since the last charge was made—I don't know, 10 years or thereabouts—they realize that in fact it is not an annual increment that is excessive. Our purpose in increasing the area charge is simply to give some penalty to companies who hold excessive crown timber areas without using them.

Mr. Foulds: The minister has rightly pointed out that the increase, a 50 per cent increase over the last 10 years which really amounts to five per cent per year, is not horrendous. He also made a commitment that over the next four years they were going to be increased by approximately 10 per cent per year.

Could he tell us what reaction he has had from the companies involved since his statement; whether his commitment is the same on that, does it seem to make sense, and what variations may occur in that over the next four years?

Hon. F. S. Miller: We have discussed with the industry that there should be an annual increment of about 10 per cent. Again, naturally their response would be that no increase could be afforded. But, having said that, I think they have accepted it and we intend to apply it.

Mr. T. P. Reid: I would like to make a comment on that. It seems to me that the minister is getting educated in his ministry and has gone some way to improving the economics of the resource industries.

The minister has introduced a bill and indicated in many of his speeches that he understands the cyclical nature, particularly of the mining industry but maybe the area dues is not the appropriate place to also apply the philosophy of cyclical nature. We are in somewhat of a strained situation in regard to our forest industries and while I am not making any brief for the forest industries per se, it seems that the minister might want to apply his philosophy of cyclical nature to the forest industry as well. It doesn't seem to me that you are doing that, particularly if you are going to increase the area dues 10 per cent willy-nilly regardless of the economic situation in the country.

Hon. F. S. Miller: I think we have to take into perspective the total revenue generated by area dues versus the total revenue generated by the crown timber dues themselves.

If I am not wrong, out of $32 million in round figures to be collected this year, some $2 million will be from the area costs. Next year it will be $3 million, so the charge for the area dues is not currently 10 per cent of the total amount the government is taking from the forest industry. The cyclical part is accounted for by the other 90 per cent. The very purpose of this bill is to index it to the selling price to allow it to fluctuate as the prices go up and down.

[10:45]

Mr. Foulds: I would just like to support the minister on this particular point, because the area charge does not seem to me to be the appropriate area to apply a cyclical tax, if that is what it is. I think the minister made the point earlier that it would, in fact, encourage those companies that are holding excessive area limits to give those up if they found the cost burdensome, and that they would then be free for the use of other perhaps smaller and independent entrepreneurs who might want to take advantage of a smaller section of limits that are not now accessible or worthwhile to them. This seems to me to be an area where the—I hate to use the term—flat rate charge is an appropriate charge.

Mr. T. P. Reid: I agree with that.

Section 4, as renumbered, agreed to.

On section 5, as renumbered:

Mr. T. P. Reid: Mr. Chairman, we were just getting into this. When we look at clause (d) we are talking about the cyclical nature of the forest industry. We can certainly agree with this, although again the whole matter seems somewhat vague, and I would have preferred to see a little more background information on just how you were going to implement this indexing situation. I do have a particular concern about section (d) in regard to the Crown dues. It seems to me that this information should be made public at some point in the operation of the Ministry of Natural Resources and of this Legislature.

I wonder if the minister could indicate if he has given any consideration to making these agreements public; and secondly, if he can maybe put on the record exactly how he foresees this indexing working, and really what index it is going to be tied to.

Mr. F. S. Miller: Yes, I can explain that, and explain also that all this information, in so far as I can tell, is public. There should be no hidden information of the type that relates to Crown dues.

First, you are giving me the authority in this act to create regulations which, in effect, will set the Crown dues every quarter, based upon the price indices of certain of the wood products and pulp and paper products in Ontario and Canada, as produced by StatsCan or by the information sources we use. I think we use a six-month running average, so that every time we would change the crown dues it wouldn't be just for the three-month period preceding the change, but for the six-month period preceding the change. So if there were sudden changes in any one month they would be dampened by the six-month average.

Therefore, the regulation would set a base for the crown dues at a certain point in time—I think it was April 1, 1978—and we would have an historic average for the last three years that would form that base. In other words, we would dampen it by averaging for three years to that point, and we would say that is the base to which the current crown dues, as set in the regulations, start. We are not really trying to generate more cash by doing so, we are simply trying to get a base to start from.

I am told they will probably go up four or five per cent in that range because of the fact that over the three years prices have been going up in certain of the products, as you know, with the exception of pulp, which is down considerably over that period of time.

Having established a base through taking a three-year average of the various commodity prices, we would then have an index worked out which would move up and down every three months as the prices changed relative to that base, using a six-month average.

Mr. Foulds: I have an amendment to this section.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Foulds moves that section 4 of the bill, renumbered as section 5, be amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

“The said section 51 be amended by adding thereto the following subsections:

“(2) On and after the first day of July 1979, where regulation is made under clause (c) or (d) of subsection 1, the minister shall within 15 days after the regulation is filed with the registrar of regulations lay a copy of the regulation before the assembly if it is in session or, if it is not, within 15 days after the commencement of the next ensuing session; and the assembly shall by resolution approve or amend the regulation.

"(3) An approval of a regulation by a resolution under subsection 2 is effective from the day that the regulation came into force.

"(4) An amendment to a regulation by a resolution under subsection 2 is effective from the day that the regulation came into force or from such other day thereafter that the assembly may specify in the resolution.

"(5) Where regulation is amended by a resolution under subsection 2, the Lieutenant Governor in Council shall give effect to the resolution by making an amending regulation in accordance with the resolution, and such amending regulation need not be laid before the assembly."

Mr. Foulds: I think this is an important and fundamental amendment. I met with the minister casually in the hallway the other day and he indicated to me the amendment was not acceptable to him. I am not sure yet how the Liberal Party responds to the amendment. I offer the amendment in the hope that the minister will see the wisdom of it and accept it. If he does not, I hope the members of the Liberal Party will accept it.

I have compromised considerably since I first suggested an amendment to this section on second reading. At that time, I offered an amendment that would require the entire formula and the entire indexing to be brought to the Legislature in legislation.

Since then I have been persuaded that although it is desirable to have all taxation brought to the Legislature before passage, in this particular case certain technical difficulties made that unworkable and impossible. Nevertheless, I do feel very strongly indeed that one of the major roles of the Legislature is to approve or disapprove taxation.

One of the things that disturbs me greatly—it arose out of the concern I and many members of my party had over the OHIP debacle earlier this spring—

Mr. Laughren: Good word for it.

Mr. Foulds: —is that increasingly revenues are coming to the general consolidated revenue fund of the province by way of regulation. It would appear to me that over the last 30 years—or over the 30 years of Conservative majority government—the government has wrested from the Legislature this prime responsibility of scrutinizing taxes before they are implemented.

For example, on the question I placed on the order paper, question 30, the Treasurer (Mr. McKeough) answered that the amount of regulated revenue into the consolidated revenue fund rose from 9.7 per cent in 1974-75 to 11.6 per cent of our income in 1977-78.

It rose in hard figures from $884,496,000 in 1974-75 to $1,410,985,000 in 1977-78.

I would think in principle we should have as much of that revenue as possible coming from open sources of taxation. I find the percentage figures more worrying than the absolute figures. When the total in the budget is increasing this much, we are getting into a situation where a sizeable proportion of our revenue is coming from regulation. That gets hidden in terms of the scrutiny that the Legislature has.

In terms of the Ministry of Natural Resources, for example, the revenue yield by regulation, through the management and forest protection royalties—what are now going to be known as area charges—actually declined between 1974 and 1977-78, from $1.9 million to roughly $1.4 million in actual revenue that was received in the consolidated revenue fund, according to the figures the Treasurer supplied to me.

On the other hand, the stumpage charged royalties rose in 1974-75 from $19.8 million to roughly $32.22 million. The decline in the area charge—and it is my understanding that the areas that have been licensed haven't been declining dramatically or at least that dramatically; if they have, I would like to know why—should be open and above board; we should see that.

I want to outline for the House and the Liberal Party and the government, the compromises that we, in this party, have made on this particular issue because we could have introduced an amendment that would have required the minister to bring the regulations before the House for implementation.

I was persuaded by very persuasive arguments put to me that that might in fact leave a gap and make it such that the regulations could not be in place, and we might have a loss of revenue from some of the companies involved. Of course, we certainly wouldn't want that. What I have done is introduce what I think is quite a workable formula.

Mr. Chairman: There are a number of private conversations that make it difficult to hear the speaker.

Mr. Nixon: It is that NDP House leader not paying attention to their new policy.

Mr. Foulds: I recognize the difficulty that is implied here. The minister and all sides of the House, it would seem, want to increase revenues. The minister, and we agree, wants to vary that dependent upon the indices based on the selling price, to reflect market conditions. That requires, as I understand from what the minister said earlier in the House, that basically the regulation will be a formula and any change in the regulation will be a change in that formula. The formula itself, is not somehow automatically adjustable should you want to increase one portion of it. That indicates that it may be necessary in administrative terms, not merely for convenience, but for enforcement—that's what persuaded me—to have the regulation in place and to have it deemed to be in place.

That's why I have said that the regulation should be brought to the House within 15 days after it is filed with the registrar of regulations. But it is absolutely essential that we reserve the right of the Legislature to vary or amend that regulation because it would require the minister to justify the change to us.

Presumably the present minister being the bright, articulate, charming fellow that he is—the man with the dazzling smile and the fancy footwork, who is slightly to the right of Genghis Khan—would like to persuade us to allow him—

Hon. F. S. Miller: I never realized you were so perceptive.

Mr. Foulds: Accept my amendment and I will sit down, or be persuaded by my oratory.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No one else is, so go ahead.

Mr. Foulds: It would force the minister and the ministry to justify the change in the regulation and give actual power back to the Legislature. This is what is important to me, the power to amend that formula, that regulation that assesses a tax if it was unjustified. The minister may very well feel I am picking on him or his ministry because the Treasurer gave me the whole list of ministries that garner fees by regulation and his is by no means the largest. The Ministry of Health, for example, which just so happens coincidentally to be this minister's former ministry, garnered by regulation approximately 10½ times the revenue his present ministry does. It also spends, what is it?—

Hon. F. S. Miller: Sixteen times.

Mr. Foulds:—sixteen times as much. The Ministry of Transportation and Communications also garners enormous amounts by regulation. But we as legislators can deal only with the bills that are immediately in front of us. The bill immediately in front of us is a bill from the Minister of Natural Resources and this is, in fact, a good place to start in regaining the power of taxation authority to the Legislature.

There was a phrase that was popular during the OHIP debate, "No taxation without legislation." Even though it is taxation on large corporate entities, which aren't particular friends of the New Democratic Party, they do deserve the fairness of scrutiny of the taxation levied against them by the Legislature rather than merely through the ministry.

I propose that the date I have included in the amendment, July 1 next year, will give the ministry plenty of time to work out its formula. The implementation, I gather, will in some cases go back to April 1 of this year. That will give the ministry 15 months to find out whether or not this plan is workable and if any significant changes in the regulation need to be brought forward.

I want to point out to the House, and to all members, that my amendment is not without precedent even in this authoritarian House. There is an amendment in the Niagara Escarpment and Planning Development Act that any orders or amendments to that act made under subsection 1 of that act, should be brought to the assembly on the day the order is made or within 15 days. There is a pattern. This is not unprecedented in Ontario history. It is, it would appear, unprecedented in terms of this particular kind of matter, a taxation matter, but is very definitely patterned on a piece of legislation. An amendment that has already been passed

I would also like to point out that the method of scrutinizing regulations and the power to amend or vary is fairly common. I understand in the federal House and if that House, authoritarian as it is, particularly under the present Prime Minister—has the authority to do it, I see no reason why the Ontario Legislature should not have that authority.

The minister may very well object, as I'm sure will some of his officials, that it is not convenient. I submit that convenience is not the prime consideration here. The prime consideration is responsible government. When we talk about responsible government, what do we talk about? We talk about a government that is responsible to a Legislature and a Legislature that is responsible to its electorate. It is time that we, as a responsible Legislature, began wresting back from a government which is authoritarian, even in a minority government situation, the authority that the Legislature has.

What we are saying basically is that there should be no more secret deals. The taxation policies and the changes in those taxation policies, which are often arbitrarily implemented through regulation, should no longer apply in a democratic society.

Hon. F. S. Miller: I take the amendment as a serious one.

Mr. Foulds: Yes, it is.

Hon. F. S. Miller: The problem with the rhetorical capabilities of some of the members of the NDP is that, given enough time, they can make almost anything sound convincing.

Mr. McClellan: Go with the flow.

Hon. F. S. Miller: I accept that the honourable member said those things with true sincerity—

Mr. Foulds: You better believe it.

Hon. F. S. Miller:—but I think we have to look at the implications of the suggestion. When you said you wanted responsible government—

Mr. Laughren: It would be nice.

Hon. F. S. Miller:—I assumed you meant majority government.

Mr. Foulds: No.

Mr. Foulds: Robert Baldwin's definition of responsible government.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order.

Hon. F. S. Miller: I think one would have to look at the problems of the government and look at the basis for this revenue. You have chosen to call it a tax. I would not choose to call it a tax. We do tax the industries. In my opinion, a tax, from the provincial point of view, is something that is related to revenue.

Mr. T. P. Reid: It is called economic rent in economics.

Hon. F. S. Miller: In this case we are making a raw material charge for a product or material existing on crown land. The charge is the same for all users of it; the only variation would be in those particular contracts where there is a bonus bid. We do have some cases where a crown due is subject to a bonus—usually on the more profitable areas—and bidding is public and, I believe, the results are available. If I'm not wrong, they make up less than 10 per cent of our total revenue at this time.

I would argue that the regulation we are putting in place today is not a tax but a charge for crown timber on crown land, which is quite different from a tax on the profitability of a company taking that crown timber off crown land. That results from many things including the managerial expertise of the company. With that, I would have to say I honestly can't accept the member's amendment. I hope my colleagues in the Liberal Party will be persuaded that we are right.

Mr. McClellan: Well, everybody knows you're right.

Mr. T. P. Reid: With regard to the minister's comments, I would say that my friend and colleague from Port Arthur (Mr. Foulds) referred to me as a "friend" when he was asking for my support and the minister just referred to me as a "colleague," so I have a little problem with this.

Mr. Conway: The troubles of the Liberal-Labour Party.

Mr. Nixon: It's public seduction.

Mr. Laughren: The member for Rainy River should stop calling himself Liberal-Labour.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Mr. Chairman, we have given serious consideration to the amendment. I had intended to move a somewhat similar amendment myself. However, I have to make three points in saying why we will not support the amendment.

First of all I am not going to get into the philosophical argument of what is a tax and what isn't. I think my friend, Mr. Laughren, would agree that I think what we are talking about is something called economic rent in economics. I don't know if they still use that term, probably they don't. It has been a long time.

Mr. Laughren: Are you still reading Eric Kierans?

Mr. T. P. Reid: In any case, the points are these: First of all, I think it is a sheer impossibility for the minister to enter into agreements with the companies, then come back to the Legislature at some future time for ratification. Business just does not, and certainly cannot, operate under those circumstances. The whole thing would grind to a halt.

Mr. Foulds: Nonsense.

Mr. T. P. Reid: My friends in the New Democratic Party do not seem to understand that uncertainty is one of the banes of investment, and certainly the uncertainty of what would happen in this Legislature, especially in minority governments, is enough to send chills up and down anybody's spine, let alone allow them to enter into any agreements that would have to wait for ratification by this Legislature. That is number one.

Mr. Foulds: No. Not so.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Two, because of the system that the minister is putting into effect with the moving average, it becomes so complicated that it is certainly not something that can be a matter of discussion in this Legislature because it is set by the moving average.

Mr. Martel: You will end up not making a cent. It will be like the mining; we will owe them money.

Mr. T. P. Reid: I would presume that these matters as to what that moving average is, obviously, will be made public, so that we are going to know, in effect, what is going on.

Mr. Foulds: There's no guarantee.

Mr. T. P. Reid: The third point is that the minister indicated in his earlier remarks that, in fact, the agreements will be made public, or that we will, in fact, know what the revenues are that are being derived from this new system.

So my concern is that we do know, and therefore have an opportunity to question both in the House and the Legislature; if I don't misread the minister, that information will be available so that it can be discussed here. I can't, in any kind of rational way, agree with the amendment because it just does not make any kind of sense to have those agreements ratified by the Legislature. It is not done in any other case of a similar nature in regard to funds or revenues that are raised by the ministry. And I say that I am satisfied that this information will be made available, and public, and that satisfies my requirement, and I see no reason for the amendment.

Mr. Foulds: It is with a considerable amount of regret that I learned that the Liberal Party will not be supporting our amendment. It is, frankly, of considerable regret to me that the minister and his officials haven't seen fit to accept the amendment. I say that just as strongly and as forcefully as I can, although quietly this morning, because it seems to me what we are doing here is putting convenience ahead of democracy.

I want to point out very clearly that the amendment that I have submitted does not contribute great uncertainty in terms of the corporation involved; they know full well what the formula is. From the day that the regulation comes into effect, any amendment cannot precede the effective day of any change to new regulation.

There can be a variation from a future date if the assembly should decide that it comes into effect after the original regulation.

What I would submit is that that would take some extra computer time. But I think the record should show that the Liberal Party and the government, when it came to this matter, decided that openness in terms of charges—whether you want to argue about whether they are taxes or economic rent or fees—would not be subject to the scrutiny of the Legislature, and action by the Legislature. This is the important point.

The member for Rainy River indicated: "as long as the minister tables the agreement." In a majority government situation—whether that majority is a NDP government majority, a Liberal government majority or a Conservative government majority—it is my firm conviction that should be subject to the will of the Legislature; that should be subject to scrutiny by the Legislature.

I gave this amendment a very good deal of thought. It may seem immodest of me, but I came to the conclusion that when the New Democratic Party forms a government in this province I or any other person in this party could live with this amendment in administrative terms, in governmental terms, and in legislative terms.

What the member for Rainy River is proposing is, frankly, what the Liberal Party always proposes—that is, a toothless tiger. They want to be able to stand up and ask questions but they don't want to take any responsibility for action when they're in opposition.

What we are proposing is giving some responsibility to the Legislature, not just the sometimes rather fruitless kicking and screaming that we do through questioning; not just outrage and talking to the press and the television cameras afterwards, but action, which means we would have the power—particularly in a minority government situation but also possibly in other situations because the authority was vested in the Legislature—to change what were unjust and unfair levies by any minister or ministry that may come in the future. That is the essential principle of this amendment.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Before you put the motion, it is my understanding of the rules that if you put the motion the entire section carries. Is that correct?

Mr. Deputy Chairman: No. This is adding to the section. If someone wishes to debate the rest and this section does not carry, I would put that section to carry.

Those in favour will please say "aye."

Those opposed will please say "nay."

In my opinion the nays have it.

Amendment stacked.

Mr. T. P. Reid: On section (e) of the renumbered clause, which gives the minister authority to fix the times at which crown charges are payable and the rate and kind of interest to be charged on overdue accounts and prescribing the method of calculating or compounding any such interest, I have a slight problem and question in relation to that section.

In the auditor's report of March 1977, on page 31, there were timber licence fees held in trust of something, and the auditor states that in order to protect crown charges in excess of $682,000 owing by a lumber company for stumpage fees, forest products in the forms of logs and lumber were seized by the province. A chartered bank also made a claim against the forest products. The question of ownership has been left to the courts to decide in an action that is still pending.

I wonder if we could amend this section to ensure that the province has first call in these matters to collect crown dues, timber dues, or crown charges. The province should be the first to be paid, over and above the chartered banks or whatever, other than perhaps a mechanic's lien action. Surely the province should have the first call for their crown charges. Would the minister care to comment?

Hon. F. S. Miller: I can't really answer that question. I may get some advice from my legal and ministry staff on that matter. I had the belief and understanding that the crown dues were the first charge. I don't know if that court case has been determined or whether in fact our assumption has been proved to be correct or incorrect. Perhaps somebody would be able to tell me. Here's a note coming in a second. Does anybody in my staff know that? If so, just send me one.

Mr. Van Horne: They are flipping coins.

Mr. Martel: They are waiting for Grossman to serve a beer, the pause that refreshes.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Cold.

Mr. Conway: Have you given any speeches in Brockville lately, Frank?

Hon. F. S. Miller: No, but I have given some speeches in Pembroke. I find it a very fine community to visit; very receptive to the truth.

Mr. Ruston: That's why they elected the member.

Mr. Roy: You just increased his majority.

Mr. Conway: Just remember, I am in the lumber business, Frank.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Martel: You will get no donations, Frank.

Hon. F. S. Miller: I have received legal advice that since the matter is currently sub judice, it should not be discussed by me until the court makes a decision.

Mr. T. P. Reid: I appreciate that. My concern was, not being a lawyer, that perhaps we could amend the act so these matters won't in fact have to go to court.

Hon. F. S. Miller: I wish any amendment to any act would guarantee something wouldn't go to court. The honourable gentleman on your right hand side, whom I believe is a member of the bar, would assure you that they will find a reason to take it to court in any event, even the amendment.

Mr. Bolan: We need the money.

Hon. F. S. Miller: Obviously, and there is no group I would rather help.

Mr. Pope: There is nothing wrong with that.

Hon. B. Stephenson: At least he's honest.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Shall section 5, as renumbered, carry, other than the stacked vote? Carried.

Hon. F. S. Miller moves that section 6 of the bill, as renumbered, be struck out, and the following substituted therefor:

6(1) This act, except section 1 and subsection 1 of section 5, comes into force on the day it receives royal assent.

(2) Section 1 and subsection 1 of section 5 shall be deemed to have come into force on the first day of April 1978.

Motion agreed to.

Section 6, as renumbered and amended, agreed to.

Mr. Foulds: When do you plan to give royal assent?

Hon. F. S. Miller: Tomorrow, I assume.

Section 7, as renumbered, agreed to.

Mr. Conway: How are they ever going to make a profit?

Mr. Foulds: On a point of order: When is this session concluding? Are we going to have a vote?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I would assume we would not give this bill third reading until we have had the vote. Presumably third reading can be given tomorrow, whenever the votes are determined by the House leaders.

Hon. F. S. Miller: On a point of order: Mr. Chairman, I need some guidance; perhaps you can help me. Since I will not be in the House tomorrow, I will have to have somebody else do it. I assume that's in order.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: That's in order.

Mr. Foulds: Have you got a parliamentary assistant?

Hon. F. S. Miller: Yes.

Mr. Conway: Don't trust him with it.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Frank, you're losing control.

Mr. Conway: You keep doing that, Frank, and I'll be elected forever.

On motion by Hon. F. S. Miller, the committee of the whole House reported progress.

CITY OF HAZELDEAN-MARCH ACT

Hon. Mr. McKeough moved second reading of Bill 131, An Act to establish the City of Hazeldean-March.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: At this point, no doubt there may be some questions in the committee stage and perhaps during second reading. All I have to say, simply, is that this, having been a dropped issue last week—

Mr. Conway: You like to boast.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —was activated by resolution of both councils. I would simply like to put on record the high degree of co-operation we have had from all three councils involved, members opposite, and members on this side of the House. I would also say in fairness to members opposite, members of my own staff, myself, my parliamentary assistant, and to the three councils involved, that there are a number of unanswered or unsolved questions as yet.

As I indicated in the statement on Tuesday, I have no doubt we will have some amendments to make to this bill in the fall. But this will allow the election to go ahead on the new basis and bring the new city into being at the appropriate time. If there are changes which need to be made, they can be made at the fall session.

Mr. Roy: I can see why the poor Treasurer, that minister who has been so emasculated the last while, is somewhat apprehensive when he gives a statement on this bill. Our approach has never been one to filibuster; we are a constructive opposition.

Mr. G. Taylor: You are not here often enough to know how to do it.

Mr. Laughren: Are you trying to tell us you have nothing to say?

Mr. Roy: We shall look at the legislation and do what we think is best for the legislation. But I have to say of this whole process that if ever there was evidence of government bungling, of a government which goes forward backwards two steps, of a government which really seems no longer able to govern, it is this whole sorry mess about the Mayo report in Ottawa-Carleton.

Mr. Makarchuk: Is this on the principle?

Mr. Roy: Here we go with the fellows to my left who would not know what the principle of the bill was even though they read it about 10 times. The origins of this bill—

Mr. Martel: Speak to the bill and let's get on with it.

Mr. Handleman: Let's discuss it.

Mr. Martel: The fount of intelligence, you are here for a day.

Mr. McClellan: Let's have some consistency here, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Roy: —stem from the Mayo report which I have here dated October 1976. The Mayo report was created with some hoopla prior to 1966, and the purpose of it was to review the whole regional government, the local government aspect. The premise was there were problems in the Ottawa-Carleton area. They were to give it a complete review and come back with suggestions to the government as to how best we could have a working process in the Ottawa-Carleton area. Some $250,000 was spent in the process and the work on the Mayo report was completed over a couple of years.

The Mayo report, although it is dated October 1976, was not presented to the people of Ottawa-Carleton until March 1977. It all came down with the fanfare this government has a reputation for. I recall the Treasurer coming down with the usual fanfare, to the Chateau Laurier, the ballroom, or one of the large rooms there—the duke or the king comes down and invites all the vassals to get the good word on the Mayo report.

Subsequent to the presentation, with all the hoopla on the Mayo report, all local municipalities were invited to make submissions in response to the recommendations of the Mayo report—and, I would hazard to think, at a great cost, if one considers the cost of each municipality drafting responses, utilizing individuals who are on the payroll of these various municipalities; many of the individuals, in fact, whom the Treasurer says are overpaid, in the statement he made just recently.

Anyway the responses were made by the various municipalities, and lo and behold the Treasurer comes back on May 8, 1978. Again an announcement is made with all the hoopla that goes with the regular travellings and the entourage of the Treasurer.

I have to tell you as an aside, this is really something. I don't know if this goes on in every regional municipality. I suspect it does. But it is always somewhat annoying. The Treasurer comes in, everybody is invited, and they must come early because the place is full. I don't know where they get all these people but, anyway, they fill up the room. Then the Treasurer comes walking in, just like royalty.

Mr. Nixon: Like the papal blessing.

Mr. Roy: It is just like the opening of the stream. The Treasurer comes walking in, goes up to the mike, then he states in a white paper—that was on May 8, 1978—

Mr. Martel: Straying a bit.

Hon. B. Stephenson: This is the principle of the bill you are speaking about?

Mr. Roy: Bette, you wouldn't know if it was the principle or if I was talking about something in hell.

Mr. Nixon: Did you hear what Stephen Lewis said about you yesterday?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Yes. He said I was terrifying. Whenever he comes in I am going to bring my Dracula teeth.

Mr. Conway: Go and see if you can find Bill 70, Bette.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I found it. You guys lost it.

Mr. Roy: He comes in and talks about the introduction of the white paper. But while the Treasurer is reading the content of his white paper, none of us, and there are whole stacks of the white paper, can look at it until he is finished speaking.

Mr. Nixon: Turning pages bothers him.

Mr. Roy: Everybody in the room sees the officials, the entourage, walking around with handfuls of these documents, and asks, "Can I have a copy?"

Mr. Nixon: No, no.

Mr. Roy: And they say, "No, the Treasurer has not finished speaking."

Mr. Nixon: Keep your place.

Mr. Roy: Then he starts off with the opening statements on May 8, 1978.

Mr. Speaker: What principle of Bill 131 is the honourable member referring to?

An hon. member: It is about time.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Speaker, if I can explain to you, the bill is a result of submissions by the Mayo report, that I have before me, of October 1976.

Mr. Laughren: So was the rent control bill.

Mr. Roy: The Mayo report, Mr. Speaker, if I can refer it for your attention at page 102, talks about the western cities.

Mr. Speaker: I don't have that before me. The only thing I have before me is Bill 131. It doesn't mention any visit by the Treasurer, or any reference to the Mayo report.

Mr. G. Taylor: That is right, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Roy: With respect, Mr. Speaker, surely if we accept your ruling then there is no sense in talking about how the legislation came into being. Surely, that is not the—

Mr. Speaker: That is not the intent of second reading of any bill.

Mr. Roy: I think it is, to show the—

Mr. Speaker: I don't think it is. I would ask you to confine your remarks to what is contained in the principle of Bill 131.

Mr. G. Taylor: Read the bill.

Mr. Roy: I will confine my remarks, Mr. Speaker, to the principle of the bill; and I think one of the principles of the bill is the minister's statement on this legislation back on May 8, 1978.

Mr. Pope: Nice try.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Speaker, the Treasurer states at that time:

"I know that many of you have been anxiously awaiting the government's response to review of local government in Ottawa-Carleton." That is how he starts his statement. Then he goes on to talk about this amendment that he is going to bring forward. He says: "We have already announced certain recommendations, in particular, reference to the enlargement of Vanier and the creation of the western city."

The western city is what we now have before us called Hazeldean-March. He stated: "It is important to single out the latter proposal which involved some large change politically and administratively. I would stress that the planning process in all areas affected should proceed as usual, and that this proposal not be a reason for delaying expenditures or plans now pending approval." That's what he said about the western city back on May 8, 1978.

At that time he stated as one of the recommendations in the white paper, on page five of the government proposal: "The government proposes that a new urban municipality be established in the west of the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton to include the whole of March township and as tightly as possible those portions of Goulbourn and Nepean townships which are presently included in the western growth area." That's the proposal. That's the basis for the legislation we have here today. He stated that back on May 8, 1978.

The local municipalities are given one month to respond to the legislation. We're expecting the legislation to come forward. We've been told for the last year that we're going to see general legislation dealing with the whole of Ottawa-Carleton before the end of the spring session.

To our surprise, as late as June 13, we were assured by the parliamentary assistant when we were discussing the election of various regional chairmen that we were going to see general legislation for Ottawa-Carleton, not only dealing with the creation of a western city but dealing with other aspects. For instance, Rockcliffe, dealing with border control, and other recommendations of the Mayo report.

Unfortunately, we were told in this House on June 15—and I read from Hansard, page 3482: "When the government received the report from Dr. Mayo and Dr. William Archer on local government in the regions of Ottawa-Carleton and Niagara, it was clear that their recommendations were matters of intense concern." It goes on: "While there is substantial agreement on some parts of the limited package presented in the white papers, other issues remain deeply contentious. The government would prefer, therefore, that more time be allowed for local discussion of these issues before taking any legislative action." We were told this on June 15, 1978. Exactly a week ago, we were told there would be no legislative action, on this matter.

It was obvious at that time what had happened, that the member for Ottawa South (Mr. Bennett)—it must have been the member for Ottawa South because the members for Carleton (Mr. Handleman) and Carleton-Grenville (Mr. Sterling) were surprised by the decision, which was really a complete emasculation of the process the Treasurer (Mr. McKeough) had set in motion. At that point I suspected it must have been him because the other two local members apparently had not be consulted, it was a surprise to them.

This was last Thursday. A few days later, last Tuesday, this legislation was brought forward and here we are dealing with Bill 131.

For a government that for so long has prided itself on giving leadership and knowing what it's doing, this whole process has not only been wasteful because of the money spent, but the evidence before us is such that it's clear the government really doesn't know what it's doing.

In spite of this, I think it's important to point out that both opposition parties have had absolutely nothing to do with the delay of any of this. We've not seen any legislation. This is our first opportunity to look at legislation flowing from the Mayo report. We've had nothing whatsoever to do with any delay. We've been waiting for the legislation to come forward. We've been told it was going to come forward.

In spite of this the member for Carleton—I really don't know how to comment sometimes about some of the things he says—the bill was introduced on June 20, but on that same day the member for Carleton had a reaction for the Ottawa Citizen, prior to the legislation even being introduced and prior to our being told about the legislation: "Handleman said that the fate of the legislation rests squarely on the shoulders of the opposition Liberals and New Democrats."

Mr. Nixon: Oh, he's a tiger back home.

Mr. Handleman: Don't you control the House?

Mr. Roy: We've had nothing to do with this. Then he goes on to state:

"If the Liberals decide to bring in some screwy amendments, then it will die on the order paper."

Mr. Nixon: Let's test that out.

Mr. Roy: He must have known you were going to speak on it today.

An hon. member: Only your bills die, Roy, only your bills.

Ms. Gigantes: Typical of Tory terrorism.

Mr. Roy: He stated at that time: "If anybody creates a lot of flack about it, it could kill it."

An hon. member: That's before the bill was introduced.

Ms. Gigantes: You're a bunch of terrorists.

Mr. Roy: That type of blackmail and intimidation borders on breaching the privileges of the members of this House. Even before a bill comes in we are told that if we do anything to it, if we even dare to look at some amendments to the legislation, the bill is going to be killed. There is a suggestion that somehow we have had something to do with the delay.

Ms. Gigantes: Shame on you, Sid.

Mr. Roy: As a member of this opposition, I will do what I think is best for the people I represent and I will not submit to that type of intimidation and blackmail on the part of that reactionary member.

Mr. Pope: That's what he was describing in this newspaper article.

Mr. Roy: When we are trying to work together constructively in the best interests of the people we represent, we get that sort of reactionary approach from that member.

Mr. Kerrio: You've learned your lesson about that, haven't you, Albert?

Mr. Roy: I give credit to the member for Carleton-Grenville to whom this is very important because it affects his riding. If it weren't for members who are as moderate as he, it would be very difficult to work with the government, when it has members like the member for Carleton who keep anticipating what the opposition will do.

Mr. Swart: Somebody has to take over for Darcy.

Mr. Kerrio: Timbrell said he would drop a bill because of his own colleagues' amendments.

Mr. Roy: Having made these comments, we do not think that we will delay this legislation. We will not filibuster this legislation, but we do have some concerns about the legislation. This legislation, which is brought in on this second-last day of the session, should really be sent to committee so that people from the area could make submissions on the legislation. There are some people who have concerns about this legislation.

Ms. Gigantes: You are going to support it, are you, Albert?

Mr. McClellan: It's no use to send it to committee.

Mr. Roy: First of all, let's look at the name of the city, Hazeldean-March. The only reason it is Hazeldean-March is because Hazeldean happens to be in the riding of the member for Carleton-Grenville and March is in the riding of the member for Carleton.

Mr. Epp: You know where you are, Sid, second.

Mr. Roy: I am even told that the member for Carleton was annoyed because it wasn't called March-Hazeldean, or that the name of Handleman wasn't somewhere in the legislation.

Mr. Conway: How about Handleman's hamlet?

Mr. G. Taylor: Roy's folly?

Mr. Roy: We know that section 6 of the proposed bill authorizes a referendum on the name of the city.

Mr. Conway: Separatist city.

Mr. Roy: I guarantee you one thing. I hope that in the referendum the name of the member for Carleton is not one of the choices; then we'll see what his popularity is like in that area.

We like the recommendations of the Mayo report which suggest the new western city be called Kanata. The name Kanata represents something that is, first of all, easier than Hazeldean-March. Secondly, it represents a concept in the Ottawa-Carleton area that is forward-looking for a new city. I know some members—and I look at the Treasurer—may not have any love for—he is now the deputy minister of—

Mr. Handleman: He is on leave, watch it.

Mr. Roy: Is he on leave now? The former deputy minister of urban affairs—what was his name?—Teron. He started the development in that area called Kanata.

Ms. Gigantes: He was a good Liberal.

Mr. Roy: It was an interesting concept. Surely that is where the growth is going to take place, where the centre of the city will be. We think the city should be called Kanata. The people should be given an opportunity of changing the name if they so wish. We agree, of course, with the part of section 6 which talks about a referendum on that basis. We like the recommendation of the Mayo report—and I am reading at page 102 where it talks about what the name of the city should be—"We suggest that this whole new urban development be called 'Kanata.'"

The feeling I get from the people in the area is that we should start with the name Kanata. We should get away from trying to satisfy the ego of at least one member. I am cautious about the member for Carleton-Grenville, because he is so smooth about his process as compared to the tiger or reactionary from Carleton.

We think the name of the city should be Kanata. I am sure you will agree, Mr. Speaker, there's a ring about the name Kanata; it has more zip, it's more forward-looking. There's something adventurous about the name Kanata. I suspect maybe that's going too far for the member for Carleton.

We hope that this bill will go to committee of the whole House, when we will be proposing an amendment regarding the name of the new city, which the Treasurer described in his statement of June 20 as something that is forward-looking. He stated: "The government agrees with local views that it would be well to end uncertainties and establish the new municipality now." Later in his statement, he said: "We are confident the city can become one of Ontario's best-governed urban municipalities within its appropriate boundaries and scope of responsibility."

We will be moving an amendment to change the name of the city from Hazeldean-

March or March-Hazeldean, to something like Kanata:

Mr. Swart: Royville.

Mr. Roy: No, there is not this sort of folly on this side. The folly, the esprit de grandeur, comes from the other side. We don't put forward ideas because they will create statues. We say to people, "Judge us on our actions here, not on puffing."

Hon. B. Stephenson: They do. They've been judging you for 33 years.

Mr. Roy: Having said that, there are other problems with the bill. Section 3 of the bill certainly is of concern to us because of the haste with which this legislation is proceeding in this Legislature and because of threats made by the member for Carleton, who says we had better not do anything drastic with this legislation or it's going to die. There's a feeling of panic. He spreads fear on all sides of the House.

Ms. Gigantes: He can't scare you, Albert.

Mr. Roy: The fact is that we should never, when we are talking about a concept as interesting as the creation of a new city—in fact, it is the first time we have seen this since the days of John White. Remember John White? He used to come into the Legislature and say, "Tomorrow, there will be a new city some place else."

All members have seen potentially new cities created here and there with different names. My colleagues know what I am talking about.

Mr. Nixon: The land he bought is still there, growing weeds.

Mr. Roy: The grandeur and the potential of some of these projects were never seen by us, but certainly the Treasurer of the day Mr. White, saw them.

Here we are, creating a new city. We feel it deserves more work. It deserves representation of people in the local area. Section 3 of the bill states that "the minister may by order do all such acts and things as may be necessary to establish wards and provide for the number of aldermen or councillors . . ." We don't very much like the idea of giving the government that sort of wide, sweeping power. We think these things should be discussed in committee. We think the people of the area should have an opportunity to say where the dangers may be, where the problems are, to make certain recommendations. But we are not going to have that in this case. What we are saying is that this bill was drafted hastily; we are going to create a new municipality and any problems we will take care of down the line. We think that, as I said earlier, it is typical of this government, the way in which they bungled and bumbled on this particular issue, and we want to put on record our concern about that approach.

I suppose there are some other concerns. In section 5, for example: "For the purposes of the Police Act, the city of Hazeldean-March"—it will hopefully be called Kanata—"shall be deemed to be a township municipality." Again, there's some concern about the haste of wanting to establish this. You know, it is a sort of Band-Aid, a sort of a knee-jerk approach to the establishment of something as forward looking as a new city.

There are concerns, Mr. Speaker, by some of the members or some of the locally-elected people, and of course these people will not have an opportunity to voice their concern, again, because of the haste of this legislation. For instance, I read in yesterday's Ottawa Citizen where it states: "March council members have some doubts. Councillor Pat Carroll said that he was still unhappy about the ward system."

Mr. Handleman: A Liberal candidate.

Mr. Roy: He states: "I am concerned about the establishment of more than one ward."

Mr. G. Taylor: Your federal candidate in the next election.

Mr. Roy: But these people, Mr. Speaker, will not have an opportunity to voice that concern here. He states: "Should we have the amalgamated city at all costs? It bothers me that we really only have two days."

Mr. Handleman: He supported the motion on a recorded vote. Why didn't he dissent?

Mr. Roy: "It's almost like the immaculate conception," he says. And Sid should know something of that.

Mr. Nixon: Which area of that is he an expert in?

Mr. Roy: Of course the March reeve, Marion Wilkinson, said that she has been informed that if anything is added to the bill, it would not go through. That is part of the whole intimidation, part of the whole process.

Mr. Kerrio: Typical.

Mr. Nixon: That's why he could not sit in the cabinet any more. They had to throw him out.

An hon. member: Wilkinson is president of Sid's riding association, so he controls her.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Speaker, I criticize many of the decisions made by the Premier (Mr. Davis) of this province, and one of the decisions I did not criticize, of course, was the shift of the member for Carleton from somewhere to the left here to the right of where he is—to his proper position. It shows exceedingly good sense.

But I want to restate again, Mr. Speaker, that in spite of the threats, in spite of the blackmail, we shall take a responsible approach on this side. It is minority government here and we shall do what we think is in the best interest of the people we represent and will not be subject to this kind of reactionary approach taken by the member for Carleton.

Ms. Gigantes: Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of Bill 131. It is a very simple bill, it calls for an amalgamation which has been suggested by study, by the Mayo report, and it has also been requested by the councils of March and Goulbourn townships. Those councils met recently and unanimously sent missives to concerned members from the area, and to the Treasurer (Mr. McKeough), requesting this change. There are questions in the local area and I think they are being thrashed out well at the local level; each member of those councils had an opportunity to discuss the fine points of this legislation within the last week and they have given serious reflection to it, I am sure. Their conclusion has been unanimous: they want the legislation.

It makes sense in planning terms and it makes sense in terms of the needs of that area, and for those reasons we support it. We will ignore the kind of behaviour from the member for Carleton (Mr. Handleman) on this subject which has been less than graceful. We shall ignore the kind of blunderbuss approach that he has taken in advocating this legislation.

We shall also give credit where credit is due. I think the member for Carleton-Granville (Mr. Sterling) and the Treasurer have acted promptly and pretty sensitively on this issue. It was one of the most urgent matters that was left behind when the Treasurer was forced to delay House consideration of changes to the Ottawa-Carleton Regional Municipality Act. I think we should give credit that they have decided to go ahead on this matter. I am informed by the Treasurer that he is also requesting a change in the procedure of the OMB so that a request made by Gloucester township council for an increase in the size of that council will be expedited. It also would have come up in the package of Ottawa-Carleton legislation. That request having gone to the OMB in January, and having been delayed at the request of the Treasurer, will now be speeded up by the OMB and we will see that council change, I hope in time for this year's municipal election. For that too I am quite grateful, as I am sure the people of the Gloucester area will be.

Mr. Sargent: What is this?

Ms. Gigantes: Mr. Speaker, we will ignore the huffings and puffings that are coming from the Liberal benches on this bill—

Mr. Nixon: We will ignore that in the light of the sweetness and sunshine coming from you.

Ms. Gigantes: —and say very simply that we support this legislation and we are glad to see it coming at the end of this session in such a prompt and sensitive way. Thank you.

Mr. Sterling: It is indeed a great pleasure to support this bill. I think congratulations are due to the two principal councils involved in this bill, the township of Goulbourn and the township of March. Under this bill, the township of Goulbourn will be losing 40 per cent of their population and 35 per cent of their assessment. We do not often see in this modern day a municipality agreeing to give up jurisdiction in that situation. I think they are to be congratulated on their attitude in this matter.

March township will also be undertaking the massive task of planning for this new western city, which will immediately have approximately 15,000 people but will have an expected population sometime in the not too distant future of 75,000 to 100,000.

I believe this new city will better align the interests of the rural and urban interests of the people in these communities. In the area which is joining the western city there is an urgent demand for a higher level of servicing at this time. I understand both councils have a certain amount of concern at this time. We have heard concerns from the townships relating to a ward system; we have heard concerns from the member for Ottawa East (Mr. Roy) regarding the name of the new municipality.

I only would comment that I thought the name that was chosen for this bill, while being very awkward, is significant in terms of showing that this is a marriage of two communities.

Mr. Kerrio: A shotgun marriage.

Mr. Roy: Considering the haste, it must have been a shotgun marriage.

Mr. Sterling: It is appropriate in recognizing this was supported by both communities to a great degree.

We don't expect this name will continue past the referendum date. I would expect probably the name of Kanata would appear on a ballot, I would expect that the name Hazeldean would appear on the ballot and I expect that there might also be other suggestions for names. But the idea here was to allow citizens of the new municipality to have their opportunity to have input into the final name of their new city.

Mr. Laughren: How about Sterlingville?

Mr. Sterling: That would be a very good name.

I believe that the joining of these municipalities was logical, that it was inevitable and that the time for bringing this forward is now. Contrary to some of the discussion that has gone on here today, there has been a great deal of discussions going on among the different municipalities for some period of time. This decision has not been made over the past few days or the past two weeks. The councils have had full discussion on the pros and cons of this matter. In fact they have had the benefit of listening to the Treasurer (Mr. McKeough) and his parliamentary assistant in terms of the financial repercussions it would have for each of these new communities.

On this day I celebrate 15 years of a most happy partnership with my wife Janet.

Mr. Roy: Today? Hear, hear.

Mr. Swart: Let's hear her version.

Mr. Sterling: I hope that this date shall mark the beginning of an equally successful marriage of these three new communities. Thank you very much.

Mr. Cassidy: What is she celebrating?

Mr. Conway: I shall, like the members participating in this debate, endeavour to be reasonably brief. I rise to support in principle Bill 131, but I do so with the caveats that were introduced by my colleague from Ottawa East. I think without question the method by means of which this Parliament has been presented with this legislation is nothing short of an abuse of this Legislature.

Ms. Gigantes: Oh come on.

Mr. Roy: Right.

Mr. Conway: Whether or not it was calculated, I will not say at this time. It represents an approach to this Legislature which I am not prepared to accept. Notwithstanding the problems that have entered into the implementation of the Mayo report, I find it repugnant in the extreme to read the Ottawa Citizen of a few days ago and to be told by my good friend from Carleton, that this bill will succumb to closure. While the member for Carleton is given, I know, to almost incessant reactionary points of view, I appreciate the vigour with which he espouses many of these points of view. But I will not be told by him nor any member of the government that this bill really must succumb to a conventional closure as they would present it. I just can't accept that.

Mr. Roy: Watch him; do what you're told.

Mr. Conway: I recommend to him and to his friend the Treasurer a speech given by the Hon. Robert L. Stanfield about the end of responsible parliamentary government. In its own way Bill 131 is all that Stanfield is talking about.

I find it interesting as well to listen to my colleague from Carleton East, and the sweetness and reason with which she greets both the Treasurer and Bill 131. Like my colleague from Ottawa East, I was trying to figure out what is the basis for this unique McKeough-Gigantes concordat. It dawns on me that the basis for it is their exclusive elitism, as it relates to the Rockcliffe issue. I am not surprised that the member for Carleton East succumbs to the elitist blandishments of the Treasurer in this regard, knowing what we know about her peculiar democratic socialism as it relates to the matters of the Rockcliffe—

Ms. Gigantes: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege.

Mr. Roy: Sit down. Take it like everybody else; come on.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order. The member for Carleton East has a point of privilege.

Ms. Gigantes: Yes, I believe I do, Mr. Speaker. It has been implied to this Legislature by the member for Renfrew North that the Treasurer and I have had discussions on Rockcliffe. This is not true.

Mr. Acting Speaker: The member for Renfrew North may continue.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, speaking briefly to the point—

Mr. Acting Speaker: Does the Treasurer have a point of privilege?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I associate myself with the remark just made by the member for Carleton East. Both she and I understand the word concordat, which the poor old member for Renfrew North just doesn't have any clues about whatsoever, which is his loss.

Mr. Nixon: It's not concordats, it's concord that you understand.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Conway: Mr. Speaker, I think that if both the member for Chatham-Kent and the member for Carleton East wish to read the record, there was no suggestion they had had a dialogue. I am simply drawing my own conclusions for the basis of this concordat.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: You wouldn't understand.

Mr. Conway: I just want it put on the record, because it—

Mr. Cassidy: That's just so much papal bull.

Mr. Conway: —relates to the principle of Bill 131, about which the member for Carleton East has some very peculiar views, not all of them unelitist when it relates to municipal reorganization in the Ottawa-Carleton region.

Mr. Laughren: Unelitist; you like to hear yourself talk, don't you, Stan?

Mr. Conway: I want to stand here today and offer my explanation as to why she could be so reasonable with the Treasurer. In other areas of the white paper and the Mayo report, and I make specific reference to Rockcliffe, their views are quite similar; and I must say, with respect to Bill 131, I am not surprised.

Ms. Gigantes: They are not the same at all.

Mr. Roy: It was the mot douce exchange here this afternoon—sweet things.

Mr. Conway: I have to say that in the last few days I have been approached by a considerable number of people in the area of Hazeldean-March—

Mr. McClellan: Name names.

Mr. Conway: It sounds like something from the Richard Nixon White House.

Mr. Walker: That is a non-known considerable number.

Mr. Roy: They are not socialists, don't worry about it.

Mr. Conway: The people who have spoken to me—

Mr. McClellan: Who are these people?

Mr. Conway: The people who have spoken to me have expressed support in principle for the bill, but they have expressed a very considerable objection to the methodology. The people who have spoken to me are concerned.

Mr. Walker: How many have spoken to you?

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Conway: The people who have spoken to me are not happy about the ward system. I am not afraid to say my good friend Pat Carroll, my old high school principal now in one of the involved townships, has drawn to my attention that he feels a personal difficulty with the ward system.

Mr. Sterling: Support the resolution.

Mr. Conway: He has also, like other involved, drawn to my attention very serious concerns about what they believe to be lasting assessment problems.

Mr. Walker: How many others?

Mr. Conway: They were prepared to accept, some weeks ago, the idea of the new western city, believing then that the Treasurer not only intended to bring forward legislation to effect municipal reorganization in Ottawa-Carleton but also to effect some measure of property tax reform.

Mr. Roy: We have been promised a lot of things by the Treasurer.

Mr. Conway: Now some of those rules have changed, or so we are told. Those problems, the problems of assessment, the problems of the ward system, are legitimate.

I realize the agreement entered into, in whatever way, by the democratic socialists and the McKeough Tories will give this bill passage through the House, and that I am quite prepared to support.

Ms. Gigantes: You are going to support it?

Mr. Conway: I am not a person to tinker with those kinds of relationships, but as one member, as a backbencher who may very well be in need of a holiday, I just find it unacceptable to—

Ms. Gigantes: A permanent holiday.

Mr. McClellan: Vote against it.

Mr. Conway: —have the Treasurer of this province lead this Legislature, and in need many of the municipalities involved, to the point that we were going to have a bill we could discuss during the last few weeks of the Legislature—

Mr. McClellan: Vote against it if you don't like it. Don't just stand—

Mr. Conway: —and then be faced with this ultimatum in the last days, indeed in the last hours. I am not prepared to accept that kind of abusive approach to a Parliament which I respect in its traditions and privileges.

Mr. Cassidy: I appreciate the chance to speak briefly on this bill to create the—

Mr. Kerrio: Nice to have you back, Mike,

Mr. Cassidy: What is that? Yes, I am just back from Quebec. I flew in, as a matter of fact, expressly for this.

I notice with concern the bad grace with which the Liberal Party has been approaching this particular bill, despite the decision to support it. I do have the feeling the reason is simply that when Carleton-Grenville is finally wrested from the hands of the Conservative Party—

Mr. Kerrio: You are an expert on everything.

Mr. Cassidy: —in whose grasp it has lain for far too many years, it will be in the hands of the New Democrats and not of the Liberals.

Mr. Conway: That's the time when hell freezes over.

Mr. Cassidy: I have heard predictions like that by parties that very quickly thereafter disappeared into oblivion.

Mr. Conway: Hey Mike, I liked the picture in the Ottawa Journal on Saturday; age 10, precocious as ever.

Mr. Epp: What's your opinion on rent review, Mike?

Mr. Kennedy: What is yours?

Mr. Cassidy: I think this bill is a healthy and constructive use of the Legislature to correct an oversight which the Treasurer was guilty of, a problem that existed in the Ottawa area because of the delays in implementing—

Mr. Conway: Overpackaged, centralizing dictator.

Mr. Mackenzie: When are you going to realize you're out of school, Sean?

Mr. Cassidy: Could you repeat that for the record?

Mr. Nixon: Well it is in the record.

Mr. Conway: When are you going to realize you are out of the union hall?

Mr. Mackenzie: I don't want to.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Would the member for Ottawa-Centre please continue and ignore the interjections?

Mr. Cassidy: It has been made necessary because of the sluggish and uncreative way in which the Treasurer has been approaching the whole question of municipal reform, and I suppose I should put on the record that while we welcome this particular bill—will you stop yapping?

Mr. Roy: Now they are yapping behind you; they have no respect.

Mr. Cassidy: While we welcome this particular bill, the decision of the Treasurer not to come to grips with promises he made earlier, as for example in relation to the board of control in Ottawa and its abolition, leaves us filled with some regret and the wish that we could have had a chance to have had a larger bill and put those amendments if the government itself was not prepared to carry out commitments it had made before.

Mr. Handleman: What about Rockcliffe?

Mr. Roy: How about Rockcliffe, Mike? How do you feel about that? Tell us your views.

Mr. Cassidy: The bill itself is a simple bill, a straightforward bill. With the anticipated growth in the western community, which has been foreseen as part of the planning in the region of Ottawa-Carleton, it was obvious that that would not be possible to be carried out efficiently and well and sensitively and responsibly if the area to be developed was going to be under three municipal jurisdictions.

In the Ottawa-Carleton area generally, we simply could not afford to wait for another further period of two years while essential planning that needed to be done for that particular area was allowed to be delayed because of the lack of adequate municipal structure.

Mr. Roy: What about your position on Rockcliffe?

Mr. Cassidy: I know a number of people who are involved in local government in that particular area. I have a good deal of respect of them and I hope that with the base that is being created by this particular bill they will be able to go through the difficult period of bringing the municipalities and the sections of municipalities together; of beginning to do the planning that is necessary and of beginning to tie together three separate areas that have grown independently, in order to make of them truly a community which commands local loyalty and a community which will grow to play its role as part of the fabric of the area of Ottawa-Carleton.

Mr. Roy: My God, what a pussycat. We know who the real opposition is around here.

Mr. Cassidy: With that, I would say, as has already been indicated by the member for Carleton East, we were grateful for the chance to be consulted about this and to join in the view that the Legislature would, in fact, do a service in Ottawa-Carleton by seeing this bill had easy passage, even if at the same time we regret the fact that some of the other things that could have been done—

Mr. Roy: Like Rockcliffe.

Mr. Cassidy: —in Ottawa-Carleton as a result of the Mayo report are simply issues that have been dumped by the Treasurer and by his government as a whole.

Mr. Roy: Ah, now we know who the real opposition is.

Mr. Handleman: I want to support Bill 131 with the moderation for which I have been praised by spokesmen from all sides of the House.

Ms. Gigantes: Says you.

Mr. Handleman: I regret the fact that members opposite feel there was a blunderbuss approach.

Mr. Conway: Have you read Tuesday's Citizen?

Mr. Handleman: There is such a thing as a calendar. Today is Thursday, tomorrow is Friday, next week is Monday. I understand certain agreements have been reached about when the session ends and obviously we are not going to be coming back in the fall to give third reading to a bill that is being amended in the meantime. However, I am pleased to hear my friend from Carleton East will support it.

Ms. Gigantes: In spite of you.

Mr. Handleman: I am glad she was able to find it in her heart to ignore her personal feelings on the way I have dealt with this bill.

Mr. Kennedy: There is no logic in her statement.

Mr. Cassidy: I want to point out first of all to the member for Ottawa East that this matter didn't begin with Mayo. An amalgamation took place in what was formerly the constituency of Carleton.

Mr. Roy: You are out of order.

Mr. Handleman: In 1973 there were three new municipalities formed and at that time the Hon. John White, who was praised by the member, announced that there would be a new urban municipality in the western part of Ottawa-Carleton.

Mr. Roy: What did he call it?

Mr. Handleman: He didn't call it anything.

Mr. Roy: That's typical. You didn't either.

Mr. Handleman: The three municipalities that were formed in 1974 chose their own names. They didn't choose names that I might have preferred, or the member for Ottawa-East might have preferred. They chose names of their own choice.

Mr. Roy: Well why did you call it Hazeldean-March?

Mr. Handleman: I refer to Rideau, which I would have liked to have seen called Richmond. I refer to West Carleton, which I would have preferred to see called Carp.

Mr. Conway: Get it right, Sidney. It is "Caarrp"—my beloved Ottawa Valley. Back to university.

Mr. Handleman: I am sorry, Rideau would have been North Gore and Goulbourn would have been Richmond. In any case, they chose names that were satisfactory to the people there. The principle of self-determination, I suppose, becomes very difficult for the member for Ottawa East who would like to tell them what they should be called. I happen to share his views on the name Kanata.

Mr. Conway: Beer in the ballpark, Sidney.

Mr. Handleman: I will not lobby for it, but I hope it will be on the ballot and I hope it will be successful. I have some admiration for Mr. Teron's technical expertise as an urban developer; and I won't mention any other aspect of his views that I don't happen to share.

Mr. Speaker, nobody has mentioned the fact that a good portion of the township of Nepean, the Bridlewood section of Nepean, will come into this new municipality. I have heard too from people who aren't at all happy about this thing. It's very easy, I suppose, to say to them: "We will make sure that your views are known;" and I have made them known to the Treasurer, as I am sure all members who have heard these views have.

Mr. Roy: Yes, so much for the democratic process.

Mr. Handleman: In the community of Bridlewood one year ago or just a little bit more than a year ago, we were out on the hustings and there was nobody in Bridlewood.

Mr. Conway: Yes, you put it there, Sidney.

Mr. Handleman: The western city was known long before the first person moved into Bridlewood, which is why the township of Nepean council has acquiesced in this loss of a portion of their territory. There is no territorial jealousy in this.

Mr. Roy: You didn't like that last election, eh?

Mr. Handleman: So I am quite happy to say that all councils have unanimously supported what the Treasurer is doing, by recorded vote as late as last Monday, long after the market value assessment and tax reform were off the books. I don't understand why councillor Carroll—

Mr. Roy: Were you surprised by the Treasurer's statement on Tuesday?

Mr. Handleman: —who has these reservations, didn't express them at that time. He had an opportunity to do so. But, of course, politics being what they are and knowing, that the present member for that area feels the same way about it—I must say that this is the feeling that Paul Dick shares with Pat Carroll and it will be great to watch them campaign at some time and try to show different views.

Mr. Conway: We're not going to have a federal election?

Mr. Handleman: They both agree that the name Kanata should be chosen; I agree with them and I hope the people will do that, but I will leave it up to them. The question of assessment we have been discussing for three years.

Mr. Roy: That is right, and doing nothing about it.

Mr. Conway: Three years? Try 10.

Mr. Handleman: The Minister of Revenue (Mr. Maeck) is always prepared—and I am sure he will let the councillors know—he is prepared to undertake the kind of financial impact study, required, and to let them know what the situation is.

But they don't have the information and neither do members opposite. They don't know what the assessment's going to be in the three different areas, they haven't got the slightest clue. They are concerned about it; we are all concerned. We have to know.

Mr. Conway: McKeough's first priority.

Mr. Handleman: I think the minister will do that. There has been some concern expressed about Hydro restructuring, because Bridlewood is now served by Nepean Municipal Hydro Commission while the other two areas are served by Ontario Hydro. There will be some problems and I expect the Minister of Energy (Mr. Baetz) to engage in a Hydro restructuring study, which hasn't been done for the area. The regional government has turned it down for the region, they have made that decision. The people in this new area want it and I think they should get it. I am sure the minister will agree to that.

As far as the ward system is concerned, again there is no unanimity on the ward system. I quite agree with what Mr. Carroll said. There are other councillors in other parts of this new municipality who want the ward system, and after all the ward system is designed to protect the minority. I think their views should be heard and the legislation does not preclude the idea of one ward. It does leave it to the minister after he's heard from all the councillors.

Mr. Conway: A peculiar interest in minority rights over there.

Mr. Handleman: And he can do it. I am not suggesting that is what will be decided, but the possibility is there, and I think—

Mr. Roy: Avoid the Legislature, eh, Sid?

Mr. Handleman:—this is the kind of legislation that we should have more of where you can have discussion before final decisions are made; and that's exactly what will happen. I have heard from the heads of municipalities as recently as this morning—

Mr. Roy: Don't bring in amendments though.

Mr. Conway: No amendments.

Mr. Handleman:—and they have all said the same thing: that if individual councillors are now departing from the unanimous recorded votes of their councils on Monday night, they are doing it completely on their own for whatever purposes they have in mind. But the councils agreed to this bill with no changes, and I hope that that's the way it will go through the House.

Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that this process which we began back in 1973 is finally coming before the House. I quite agree it has taken a long time, but when somebody says that we should have more months of consultation and delegation—and it happens not to have been in the riding of the member for Ottawa East—I say this thing has been discussed, discussed and discussed.

Mr. Conway: Stanfield is right, executive dictatorship.

Mr. Handleman: There has to come a time when the legislation is presented and passed. More public discussion will simply delay what we should have been doing two years ago; now that the councils have realized this I think we should go along with their wishes. That's what local autonomy is all about and I am prepared to support the bill with no amendments.

Mr. Epp: What the member for Carleton says is interesting, that they have been consulting on this since 1973, that there has been a lot of talk about it and that all of a sudden we find that a bill has been brought in in the last—what? it was only printed yesterday or today, so they've had about five years to print it and they printed it in the last day or two.

Mr. Conway: A deathbed confession.

Mr. Epp: Nevertheless, it is interesting to get up and speak on this bill and to support it in principle. What it does is bring in the township of March and parts of the townships of Nepean and Goulbourn. Although this was recommended in the Mayo report and, I suppose, supported in part by the government, nevertheless it was never brought in as part of what should have been a much larger bill dealing with the whole region, particularly after spending a lot of money, about $250,000, as the member for Ottawa East (Mr. Roy) has indicated.

I would like to get some clarification from the Treasurer (Mr. McKeough) some time during this debate as to the amount of money he is going to give to the various municipalities. Questions have been raised with me by members of the municipalities to find out how much money is going to go to Goulbourn and how much money is going to go to the new city in transitional payments and to the Stittsville sewer project. Maybe he can give us some clarification on some of those matters.

When we talk about bringing this in and about the consultation process, and consider the great emphasis that has been placed on regional governments by the present government, certainly the regional government was not consulted as to whether it agreed with bringing this bill in at this time in isolation of any other amendments that could have been introduced but were not introduced.

Mr. Handleman: I thought they were going to eliminate Goulbourn completely.

Mr. Epp: Is that your suggestion?

Mr. Handleman: That is what they wanted to do: eliminate Goulbourn—get rid of the rural people. They passed a resolution.

Mr. Conway: That has never stopped you before.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The member for Waterloo North has the floor.

Mr. Epp: We will be supporting this bill and, when it goes to committee, we hope we'll get some clarification of a number of points. Certainly the name of Hazeldean-March, which has been designated by the Treasurer, is not acceptable. As my colleague indicated earlier, we will propose an amendment to change the name to Kanata, which obviously would be much more acceptable to the people in that area.

Mr. Roy: That's right. You said it yourself.

Mr. Epp: The shock of the people in that area to the name that was proposed was such that they wondered whether the Treasurer was out to lunch when he proposed this name. Obviously there are other names that would be much more acceptable, and I'm sure Kanata would be that name.

Mr. Sterling: There are 4,000 voters in Glencairn who don't agree.

Mr. Handleman: Ask the people in Glencairn.

Mr. Roy: We're just trying to get a proper name.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The honourable member for Welland-Thorold.

Mr. Swart: Mr. Speaker, obviously I rise to speak in support of this bill, as I share the views of my colleagues in the caucus from the Carleton area. I really rise to say to my friends on the right that I think, first of all, they should support the bill, and perhaps they should forget about the amendment which they say they are going to propose at this time.

Mr. Roy: No, we go the same way on second and third reading, we don't switch.

Mr. Swart: I suspect they're right in saying that they're going to vote for the bill. All their comment has been against it; so they will likely vote for it, as they did in the case of regional chairmen: they talked in favour of it and then voted against it.

Mr. Roy: Just like you talk against something on second reading and then bring forward an amendment in committee.

Mr. Swart: I just say to them that they shouldn't react too strongly to the member for Carleton (Mr. Handleman), to the point of moving amendments to this bill. I know that he rather annoys them, but I should point out to them that it could be worse.

Mr. Conway: Unlike you, he is always here to vote for his amendments.

Mr. Swart: They could have him in their caucus; think of the problem they would have then. It would be like the problem they have over there.

Mr. Nixon: There's no chance of you being in it. You're in bed with them. We're still working on Ellis Morningstar.

Mr. Swart: You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that the Treasurer is here today. This is the first time the Treasurer has been in this House for a municipal bill. I doubt if it's because he thinks the bill is quite that important; it's just that he knew that the member for Carleton would be here. After the way the member for Carleton has broken with their caucus, whether it was over rent review or the French-language issue, I think the Treasurer is here just to make sure things are safe over there for the government.

Mr. Roy: He has only changed his mind three times in the last month.

Mr. Conway: What is his position on the boycott bill?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the honourable member return to the principle of the bill?

Mr. Swart: Of course I will, if you consider I got away from it, I will return to it.

Granted it is late in the day bringing in this bill—

Mr. Roy: No, it is only 25 after 12.

Mr. Swart:—and we like to have the time to deal adequately with it. First of all, we would like to have a composite bill dealing with the whole area down there. Obviously, as I suppose our friends on the right would, we would like to have had this bill in sooner, but let me point out to my friends on the right that if it's not dealt with at this time it delays the formation of that city for two years.

I suspect there's a lot of merit now in forming that city at this time to let them get on with the job of melding those municipalities together and planning for the new city. There are many other things in the report of the Ottawa-Carleton region that can be brought in—

Mr. Conway: You have noticed.

Mr. Swart:—that is amendments which can be brought in to be effective at another time.

Mr. Conway: Now you sound like Macenzie King.

Mr. Swart: Oh yes, it can be effective a year from now. This particular part of the report has to deal with now or wait for two years. So I think there is merit in dealing with it at this time. I too commend the Treasurer for bringing it in. In fact, I am delighted to see him doing what the people want.

Mr. Conway: Same old gang.

Mr. Roy: You should be in trouble, Darcy, having Mel Swart and Evelyn Gigantes coming at you.

Mr. Swart: You know this year, Mr. Speaker, whether it's in the Hamilton-Wentworth or whether it's in Northumberland county, we have seen, it appears, a change on the part of the Treasurer so that he wants to do what the people in the area want done.

Ms. Gigantes: He is repentant.

Mr. Swart: Surely, I would not want to interfere with that great transition in the character and the attitude of the Treasurer of this province.

I'm not going to take any greater length of time. May I just ask the Treasurer—

Mr. Conway: No principles at all Mel, sold out for a song.

Mr. Swart:—when he rises to speak on this, will he tell us whether the amount of money which is going to be provided during the transition period is the normal amount under the regulations? Whether there are any special considerations being given there? If so, why? I want to make it clear I am not against special consideration if there is reason, but I would like to know if it is the normal sort of transition grant and changes. There is nothing in this bill about determining whether part of the township of March will be annexed to West Carleton. Has the Treasurer given anything in writing to the municipalities to the effect that consideration will be given to that, which appears to be the wish at this time, although that may be changed?

I know there are normal procedures in the municipal act for them to use, but I wonder if he has given them anything in writing that at least the provincial government would not step in to object to any changes they might want to make with regard to March. Having said that, we will support the bill. Quite frankly, we support it with some enthusiasm.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I think there is an amendment to be proposed, I gather, although I will do my best to talk the Liberal Party out of their indiscretion in that area.

It seems to me the bill will be going into committee of the whole and the questions that have been raised perhaps can best be answered there section by section. So at this moment, I will simply thank the member for Carleton East, and associate myself with her graceful remarks.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered for committee of the whole.

GAME AND FISH AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. F. S. Miller moved second reading of Bill 123, An Act to amend the Game and Fish Act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the honourable minister have an opening statement?

Hon. F. S. Miller: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nixon: The minister has indicated that he feels it is necessary, if not essential, that the bill proceed and not be postponed until the fall, since it deals with the establishment of the bag limits in certain areas of hunting—presumably he is the expert in that connection.

I feel we owe him a favour in some connection, but I cannot quite recall. But on his say-so, then certainly, we have no objection to the bill and we support it in principle.

Mr. Foulds: I rise on behalf of my party and after careful and thorough scrutiny, we support the bill. As I understand it, it gives the minister the right, through regulation, to devise what is called a selective buck quota in terms of the animals or game birds that may be "taken or possessed." It is not essential, but it would be worthwhile to have the authority in place for the minister so that he could implement the variations which he wishes in certain areas of the province before the fall hunting season. In that spirit, we support the bill without amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there any other member wishing to participate? The member for Renfrew North?

Mr. Conway: No.

Motion agreed to.

The bill was also given third reading on motion.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to move, unless there is some objection, government motion 13, while the Speaker is in the Chair.

Mr. Nixon: No objection.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. Mr. McKeough moved resolution No. 13:

Resolved: That the authority of the Treasurer of Ontario granted on March 28, 1978, to pay the salaries of the civil servants and other necessary payments pending the voting of supply for the period commencing April 1, 1978, be extended to October 31, 1978, such payments to be charged to the proper appropriation following the voting of supply.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk.

Mr. Nixon: We have no objection to the passage of the resolution at this time.

Mr. Conway: You don't want to make a speech on the size of the salaries, Darcy?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The honourable member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Laughren: I am really astounded that the Minister of Revenue (Mr. Maeck) would second that motion by the Treasurer, given what the Treasurer has done to him in the last couple of weeks on assessment reform. I am really surprised and I offer both my condolences and any help I can give him. We, of course, will support the resolution. But it is with a great deal of restraint that I don't launch into a long series of suggestions as to what the Treasurer should be required to do before he seeks permission of this Legislature to have concurrence in this resolution.

A lot of things have happened in the last two or three months that lead us on this side to believe the Treasurer should come before us with a new set of budgetary policies. I shall be addressing myself to that either later tonight or tomorrow, so I will refrain from further comments at this time. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there any other member who wishes to participate?

Mr. Nixon: Carried.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the provincial Treasurer any comments?

Mr. Conway: It is the size of those salaries that shocks me.

Motion agreed to.

House in committee of the whole.

CITY OF HAZELDEAN-MARCH ACT

Consideration of Bill 131, An Act to establish the City of Hazeldean-March.

Mr. Chairman: Are there any comments on any section of this bill?

On section 1:

Mr. Roy: I'd like to speak on section 1, and in fact move an amendment on section 1.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Roy moves that section 1 of the bill be amended by changing the wording in the last line of the first paragraph from "Hazeldean-March" to "Kanata."

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I hope the member will reconsider when he appreciates the fact that this is an amalgamation, as opposed to an annexation. Perhaps he might, with some sensitivity, consider the fact that the name "Hazeldean-March" in that order, was recommended to me by the March township council, who presumably have every reason to believe "Kanata" is a better name, as does the member for the area—perhaps the member for Carleton (Mr. Handleman) does. But the March township council, in their wisdom, suggested that a neutral name should be in the bill and that it be put on the ballot.

So I suggest that you might want to take that amendment back. I think you might think of the people in Glencairn and the people in Bridlewood. I think you might think of the people in the north end of March, which is a very historic area. I suggest to you that a neutral name such as was suggested to me by the March township council, is probably the best choice.

Mr. Roy: In proposing this amendment, of course, it's not our intention to offend anyone. We have read the Mayo report, and its recommendations at length. We know the Mayo commission sat for many months. They received representations from many municipalities and they made the recommendation that the new city be called "Kanata." We think, from our discussions with various people, that likely that's going to be the name they're going to vote for in the referendum in any event. We don't want to preclude that. We say the section should remain there. If they want to change it, that's fine.

Having looked at the recommendations of the Mayo report, keeping in mind some of the representations made, and it's not our intention to offend anyone, we feel it reflects what is going to be a new and exciting concept in the western part of the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton. It should get off on that basis, in spite of the fumbling and the irrational approach taken by the Treasurer in responding to the whole Mayo report.

He talks about local government input, but he has not followed local government very much, for instance, from the city of Ottawa when they were talking about board of control. In one sense he shows extreme sensitivity and on the other hand he's prepared to run roughshod over the wishes of the local municipality.

I say very simply and I want to repeat for the record, that it is not our intention to be offensive to anyone.

Ms. Gigantes: You are just being tiresome.

Mr. Roy: I am being what, she says?

Mr. Conway: Tiresome?

Mr. Roy: She talks like a frustrated mistress. My God, it is that kind of a morning.

Ms. Gigantes: None of your sexist remarks.

Mr. Foulds: You talk like a frustrated poppycock; that's what you talk like.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Roy: Some of these things may be quoted in the Globe and Mail in the next article when they talk about intelligent interjections.

Mr. Foulds: By the way, I didn't say verbosity, I said verbosity.

Mr. Roy: I notice that the crudeness in some of the interjections came from the party to my left, Mr. Chairman, quoted by the Globe and Mail this morning.

Mr. Laughren: Speaking of crudeness, what do you think you are engaged in right now?

Mr. Roy: In any event, returning to the amendment: Your stare, Mr. Chairman, has brought me back to the principle of the amendment. I go to page 102 of the Mayo report which is the basis of what this whole process is about.

It states: "As discussed in chapter four the regional official plan calls for the development of three satellite cities in the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton. The western urban community is being rapidly developed and it is expected to reach 100,000 population in the year 2000. It will include Kanata, in March township, Glencairn and North Hazeldean in Goulbourn township, and Bridlewood in Nepean township. It will also include extra land, enough to accommodate the expected 100,000 people. We suggest this whole new urban development be called Kanata."

There is a ring to this which reflects the whole new concept. It says: "Briefs received from March township, the March rural association, the Kanata-Beaverbrook Community Association, and the Goulbourn Rural Ratepayers' Association state that those parts of March, Goulbourn, and Nepean township to be included in the western satellite city (or Kanata) should be joined to form a new urban municipality. We recommend that this step be taken as soon as possible."

It goes on to state: "This western satellite city (Kanata) is to form a self-contained unit. Major centres of employment and commercial activity are expected to reduce, as far as possible, commuting to downtown Ottawa. The town centre for the new city is planned to be in the present Kanata, adjacent to the western expansion of highway 417."

So it responds to the concept that we were talking about. The whole centre of the city is going to be around the present development of Kanata, and of course Kanata is, as it is stated here, planned to be adjacent to the western extension of highway 417.

Having this in mind, and having in mind that the people of the area will be given an opportunity by way of referendum to change the name—and hopefully we won't have a situation where there will be a multiple choice situation at that referendum, because I think there is some community of interest, and I think there is some consensus in the area on what they feel about the name. I have a feeling, in spite of the response by March township and some of the friends of the member for Carleton, that there was some breast beating on the part of some of the local members that they would like to have Hazeldean, which represents one area, and March which represents the other area.

As I said before, I suppose the member for Carleton is annoyed that it wasn't the other way around.

Mr. Handleman: I wasn't annoyed—

Mr. Roy: You are obviously frustrated about something. Some of your comments express a man who is ready to bite into anything that comes within striking distance.

Mr. Foulds: What is it with these personal attacks this morning?

Mr. Roy: We are prejudging this. We feel that as all recommendations of the Mayo report were based on this concept of Kanata we should start on that footing—that it responds to this interesting and exciting new concept of a city out there. We feel that then the people will be given an opportunity of looking or voting on what the proper name should be.

We think the amendment should remain. It is not an attempt to frustrate the recommendations of the local people. It is not an attempt to run roughshod over sensitivities, as with some other recommendations—God knows the Treasurer has experience in that field; it has never been the approach of this party. But we feel this is the proper footing to get this exciting new city going, by having a name such as Kanata.

Mr. Swart: Mr. Chairman, we are not going to support the amendment that is before us, basically for two reasons: It has to be our view that the Liberal Party is endeavouring in this amendment to firmly establish the name for that new city. They are to a very substantial degree trying to circumvent the right of the people. It is my understanding from talking to both of the Reeves in the area that they support the name Hazeldean-March solely as an interim name, with the full realization that that will not be the final name of the city. I understand they want to maintain as neutral a position as possible at this time.

The amendment, I think you would agree, would not do that. It would establish that name, after a strenuous debate in this House, and to some extent at least it would put a bias to the vote which would be taking place this fall.

For those two reasons, because the municipalities want this interim name, because it is considered by them only to be an interim name and because the Liberal Party is endeavouring, to some extent, to influence the vote which is going to take place—

Mr. Conway: No.

Mr. Swart: I grant you you don't have a great deal of influence in the area—

Mr. Roy: That member has even less.

Mr. Swart: But the Liberal Party is going to endeavour to establish firmly that name now. We want to leave it entirely up to the people in the area, and we will not be supporting that amendment.

Mr. Chairman: Are there any further comments on this amendment?

Mr. Sterling: Mr. Chairman, I would only point out to the member for Ottawa East that we are putting together, as has been mentioned before, two urban communities of roughly equal size. However, the area which is commonly known as Kanata at this time is the larger area in terms of population. I think if we are going to make this partnership work in the future we should go in on the basis that there is some kind of equality in this partnership.

I would also like to point out that there is a different level of housing in these two areas. I think it is important that both of these two communities feel equal in going into this new venture.

Mr. Roy: I would like to make just one more comment, Mr. Chairman, in relation to the amendment.

Mr. Makarchuk: The member realizes he is getting a little tedious around here.

Mr. Roy: Tedious? It is interesting that comment should come from the member to my left who has been boring us for the last four months. He should tell us that we are getting tedious.

I want to say to the member for Welland-Thorold that for him to suggest an intention on our part, by making this amendment, to try to influence the final name decision is not—

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The member's foot is getting in deeper and deeper.

Mr. Roy: You're babbling away. Yes, take an aggressive approach; that is the only aggression the Treasurer has had. He has been backing off for the last month around this place. That is what he has been doing. He has no guts. If he had any principles he would resign.

Mr. Chairman: Order. Order.

Mr. Roy: They have been having the Treasurer make somersaults.

Mr. Handleman: It is a responsive government.

Mr. Roy: Responsive, yes. They have him on a yo-yo, for God's sake.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Chairman, I apologize that the Treasurer has so antagonized me that I—for a moment there I thought I was getting involved in a very violent—

Mr. Nixon: He's been very provocative.

Mr. Roy: Very provocative, as my colleague said.

I want to say this, Mr. Chairman; there is no intention whatsoever to influence a name change. What we're trying to do, and I think that the comments from the member for Welland-Thorold, who believes in local autonomy—

Mr. Swart: That's Thorold.

Mr. Roy: Is there a problem? There's a fellow who has been talking in this House as though he has been lacking part of his anatomy and he is telling me how to make pronouncements.

I want to say this, I think the member for Welland-Thorold—is that okay?

Mr. Swart: No, it's Thorold.

Mr. Roy: Okay, I've got a problem with the "th." The only advantage I have in sitting here is not sitting in front of him so that I don't get that rainstorm every time he gets up.

Mr. Gregory: That's pretty gross.

Mr. Laughren: You have really raised the level of debate.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Roy: Mr. Chairman, I want to say this: I think his comments are such that they are an insult to the whole democratic process. It was Mayo who made the recommendation that the name Kanata be used. It was Mayo who did after receiving recommendations from various groups right across the whole Ottawa-Carleton area.

Mr. Swart: You are not making a recommendation, you want to legally change it.

Mr. Roy: For that member to stand here—and he doesn't have a clue as to what is going on in Ottawa-Carleton—and say that we're trying to influence something—

Mr. Bounsall: I'm not sure you know anything about what's going on either.

Mr. Roy: If you have any guts come in and speak in our riding so you can increase our majority.

We think the amendment is a proper amendment. It reflects what the local people there wanted, and we're saying, basically, these are based on the May report. We think that Kanata is a far more exciting name, and I'm surprised that the members to my left, who talk about visions and who talk about principles, would not see fit to support such a sensible amendment, which is based on local input.

Mr. Chairman: All those in favour of Mr. Roy's amendment please say "aye."

All those opposed will please say "nay."

In my opinion the nays have it.

I declare the amendment lost.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3:

Mr. Roy: Mr. Chairman, I hear from my left the word filibuster. I find it interesting that those members who wasted our time for months on end cannot see the distinction between constructive debate on a piece of legislation and a filibuster.

An hon. member: The member for Carleton East (Ms. Gigantes) is getting to you.

Mr. Roy: Don't worry. I don't think the member for Carleton East will ever get to me—not in that situation.

In relation to section 3, I'd like to ask the Treasurer what some of the things are that he has in mind in relation to having ministerial orders necessary to establish wards and to provide a number of aldermen and councillors. I'd like to get some comments on the part of the Treasurer on some of the things he foresees will be necessary to be done by way of orders.

As I read section 3, Mr. Chairman, it states here that:

"The minister may, by order, do all such acts and things which may be necessary to establish wards and to provide the number of aldermen or councillors, as the case may be, in the city of Hazeldean-March, the township of Goulbourn, the township of Nepean and provide such other matters as he considers necessary to hold the elections in the municipalities in 1978."

My concern is, if in this bill we're establishing by way of section—I don't recall what section it is that they're going to have a mayor and so many councillors.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: It's section 4.

Mr. Roy: Is it section 4? "There shall be elected a mayor and six aldermen." Why is it that we would need, by way of ministerial orders, suggestions as to provide for the number of aldermen and councillors?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: We're talking about Goulbourn.

Mr. Roy: Yes, but you're talking about Hazeldean-March in section 3. I would just like to get some comments from the minister on that.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might make a general comment on that as well, because there were questions with respect to the ward system. March has had a tradition of not having wards, Goulbourn has had a tradition of having wards, and Nepean has not had wards. Without going into all the details, there is some feeling between the various subdivisions; some subdivisions—communities, if I can put it that way—are larger than others.

In particular, I think the Goulbourn people felt, and I respected their views, that those who were from March might tend to dominate things in the new city. But no one will ever know whether that is a legitimate concern or not. As a matter of principle, I and the ministry would not advocate a ward system. We obviously have accepted them, although there is no general legislation in place. Kitchener, for example, moved to a ward system this year, and perhaps that was a right decision. But when our advice is asked, we will normally say, "Avoid a ward system as long as you can," in terms of the parochialism it can sometimes bring. There does come a point, however, when a municipality gets large enough that it probably does need a ward system.

Having said all that, in the restructuring legislation we have consistently gone along with a ward system, even though the municipality might be relatively small, as a way of preserving some identity and making sure, although it would probably happen anyway, that each area is represented.

The March council—there is no vote on this, but if I can put it this way—I think the council understands the reason why I am proposing a ward system, or that we would put it in the bill. They worry somewhat that if there is to be a ward system, there are roughly 800 or 1,000 people in north March, who may end up in north March or who may end up some place else—

Mr. Roy: Where?

Mr. Handleman: Rural March.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Rural March—who will be rural citizens in a somewhat larger municipality. Whether in some way or other they need a ward system has not been finally determined. When and if the bill goes through, we would propose to have a series of meetings with the three councils and sort out, if there are to be wards, what kind—there will be wards; I think that is settled in my mind, but I can still be persuaded against it. Because of the Goulbourn people particularly, we probably do need a ward system for the first two years. If they want to get rid of it after that, fine and dandy, and I'll applaud them.

The rest of that section is a standard section which allows me to bring the three clerks together. One of their number will become the returning officer for the election, and everything he or she does is authorized by me under this section. It is a pretty neat section for the purpose of this first election to facilitate matters. We stand in the place of the Ontario Municipal Board, of course, because we will ask where the wards should be. It won't go through the municipal board process; this section then gives me the authority to order the wards.

Mr. Handleman: My position here puts me at some disadvantage in catching your eye, Mr. Chairman. I just want to say that I have constantly been opposed to the idea of a ward system. I think our at-large system in both March and Nepean has served us well; it provides for a cohesive community. But I do want to point out to the member for Ottawa East that the people in Goulbourn who are coming into the new municipality have been underrepresented on their own council over the past number of years because of the vast growth in the Glencairn ward. They are sensitive to the idea of being assured of representation on the new council.

I have spoken to the members of the March council who have been communicating with me, and I have assured them that if there is unanimity on the question of an election at large, there would be no difficulty with the government or the minister in putting that into the legislation. As I read the section, it can provide for a one-ward system.

I don't think that will be the result of the discussions; I am quite sure the people of Goulbourn will be quite adamant in their insistence of assured representation. If another system or technique can be devised to assure them of representation on the council, I'm sure the minister will take it into account.

[1:00]

I agree with the member for Ottawa East that an award system may create divisions. In this case, the division is there now. We have to recognize it and somehow assure them their voices will be heard in this very important two years of the formation of this new city.

Mr. Roy: May I ask the Treasurer: Will grants be made under section 3? Is it under the authority of section 3 as well that—

Hon. Mr. McKeough: No, the authority to do that, actually, is in the Unconditional Grants Act. It is not in this act at all.

Mr. Roy: You don't need it in this?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: No.

Section 3 agreed to.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5:

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The member asked about section 5.

A strict interpretation of the Police Act would say that on December 1 next they have to have their own police force completely in place. There is no police force there now other than the Ontario Provincial Police. They want their own police force, but obviously it has to be recruited, and paid for. My guess is that's going to take several years.

By doing this, the OPP can stay there as long as necessary, and stay there not illegally, if I can put it that way. We'll work out a timetable.

Mr. Roy: This is always a problem in the Ottawa-Carleton area, because of the number of police forces. It's something you've avoided in spite of the fact that it's recommended by Mayo. I'm not afraid to put on the record that I don't agree with one of those suggestions about a regional force.

When these people are getting the services of the Ontario Provincial Police, are you satisfied they are paying the full cost for these services? In view of the fact that the township of Nepean has a relatively large police force taking care of quite a large urban municipality, has it ever been considered that maybe Nepean should look at the policing? Is it their decision that they don't particularly want that?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: It has been discussed; I don't know how seriously. It's obviously, I suppose, a large question on the plate of the new council, when they are elected, as to how they handle it.

This section simply removes the necessity of having to act on December 1. I don't know that it is necessary—as a matter of fact, it is not. The OPP are still being phased out of the two regions, I think, at present. We've never done that legislatively or have had to authorize that by legislation. But the March council and the Goulbourn council, as well, said their reading of the act would indicate they'd have to provide full policing on December 1. I said, "That is not the intention and the Ontario Police Commission or the Ontario Provincial Police will not be expecting anything like that, but for your protection we'll put this section in the bill." That's how it got there.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6:

Mr. Roy: The question I have in relation to section 6 is it going to be up to the new municipality to decide the nature of the referendum they're going to have for the name, or is it going to be within the purview of the province to decide that?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: It's the purview of the province.

Mr. Roy: The purview of the province, okay. Secondly, is the municipality going to decide the alternative choices for the name of the municipality, or is that again something that is within the jurisdiction of the province?

I suppose you would take suggestions from the local municipalities, but it is the province which decides the nature of the referendum and what names they will decide on for the new city. Is that what you're saying?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Yes, because the new council won't be there. This referendum would be held on November 14 when the new council is elected.

If the new council doesn't like it, of course, then they can have another referendum either two years later or sooner.

What we will do, of course, is consult with the three councils and in some way ask them to choose names. I have forgotten how it was done in Waterloo. I think those names were suggested; I have forgotten by whom. In the case with which I was most intimately connected—and that was before I knew the member for Carleton East too—was Thunder Bay. We made the very sensible decision there, I thought, to ask the public school children, the elementary school children.

Mr. Foulds: You are going to stimulate me to speak.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: They had a vote and came up with three names which were well accepted. That's how the three names were chosen. They were recommended to me and I placed them on the ballot—one of the great success stories of all times.

Mr. Roy: Could I ask the Treasurer if he has made a final decision on the names?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: No, no.

Mr. Roy: You have not made that decision. Is Kanata going to be one of them?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I'll suggest it.

Mr. Foulds: I'm sorry, I wasn't going to give my Thunder Bay, The Lakehead, and Lakehead speech, the saga and the ballad of the amalgamated city that has become known as Thunder Bay, but in the fact the Treasurer will admit privately if not publicly that there was an error made in putting on the ballot the conflicting and confusing choice of Lakehead, The Lakehead, or Thunder Bay. The majority of people would have voted and did vote for some variation of Lakehead or the Lakehead, but Thunder Bay squeaked through the middle. To this day, some people see it as a paranoid plot of the Treasurer. I don't ascribe it to that at all. I think it was mere incompetence and ignorance of the issue at the time.

Mr. Conway: Is it true that the member for Carleton favours sovereignty-association?

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Epp: I wonder if the Treasurer could indicate whether he has a limit to the number of names on the ballot. Are there just three, or could six or 10 names be on?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: No, I have none. Each time it has been three, hasn't it? It's never been more than three. I think we'll suggest that, but if they desperately want four, fine.

Section 6 agreed to.

Sections 7 and 8 agreed to.

Bill 131 reported.

On motion by Hon. Mr. Welch, the committee of the whole House reported one bill without amendment.

THIRD READING

The following bill was given third reading on motion:

Bill 131, An Act to establish the City of Hazeldean-March.

Mr. Roy: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I might state that the fact that this bill went through two stages in one particular day is due largely to the co-operation of the Liberal Party. We know the rules of procedure—

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order. Order.

Mr. Roy:—and we did not object to it.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Foulds: Out of order.

Mr. Martel: Mr. Speaker, he doesn't have a point of order. There is no standing rule that says that.

Mr. Roy: Yes, there is. There is a standing rule that says 20 members can object.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Speaking to the point of order—

Mr. Acting Speaker: With respect, Mr. Treasurer, there is no point of order to speak to.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: It really is a matter of privilege. I would have to thank members opposite for their co-operation in expediting this bill. I really thought it was so cute that the member for Ottawa East felt he had got himself in so far, he didn't know how he was going to get out of this name business, where he really was on a very sticky wicket. Do the members know how he got out of it?

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: When it came time to put the vote there were only four Grits in the House, so he didn't have to be embarrassed on the record. That was clever. I admire him, I really do.

Mr. Roy: After your performance of the last few weeks, I have no problem.

CITY OF LONDON ACT

Mr. Gregory, on behalf of Mr. Walker, moved second reading of Bill Pr13, An Act respecting the City of London.

Motion agreed to.

Third reading also agreed to on motion.

HAMILTON CIVIC HOSPITALS ACT

Motion agreed to.

Third reading also agreed to on motion.

CITY OF THUNDER BAY ACT

Mr. Gregory, on behalf of Mr. Hennessy, moved second reading of Bill Pr26, An Act respecting the city of Thunder Bay.

Mr. Foulds: Mr. Speaker, in an act of generosity, I offered to move the second reading. I offer to move the third reading as we supported the bill along with Mr. Hennessy.

Motion agreed to.

Third reading also agreed to on motion.

POLY AIRE INTERNATIONAL LIMITED ACT

Mr. Gregory, on behalf of Mr. Leluk, moved second reading of Bill Pr29, An Act to revive Poly Aire International Limited.

Motion agreed to.

Third reading also agreed to on motion.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. B. Stephenson moved second reading of Bill 126, An Act to amend the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Speaker, there is little to add to the statement I made earlier this week, when this bill was introduced. I would like the honourable members, having had the opportunity to peruse at least the Wyatt report, to be aware that the recommendations made within the bill on the increases in levels of benefits are those based upon the Wyatt report and the recommendations of the Workmen's Compensation Board. It is my understanding that the Workmen's Compensation Board, in their deliberations on this subject, were very close to the recommendations made by the joint consultative committee, a committee of that board, and that those recommendations were the basis for the decisions made by the Workmen's Compensation Board.

I would remind the honourable members that the Workmen's Compensation Board does have to report to me and the joint consultative committee is an internal committee of that board, and I am not privy to all of their deliberations. I think it is incumbent upon the members of the House, Mr. Speaker, and I feel very much constrained to ensure, that these amendments are passed by this House as rapidly as possible so that they may be in place for the benefit of Workmen's Compensation recipients by July 1.

Mr. O'Neil: I would like to open my remarks by saying that although we are very pleased to see this bill brought in by the minister, we have been quite upset, as I know members of the other opposition party have been, at the delay before the increases were brought into the Legislature. I realize the minister has stated that she was awaiting the results of the Wyatt report, but it is my understanding that the Wyatt report has been in the hands of her ministry for approximately two months. This is not right? That was my understanding from some of the quotes that were made, and I will check on Hansard on that. I might recall also that as far back as April 13, 1978, the member for Erie (Mr. Haggerty), who is very interested in the Workmen's Compensation Board and in seeing that the workers are covered properly, given the right amount of benefits and looked after by the board, made several comments that may be found on page 1500 of the April 13, 1978, Hansard.

Another study which was mentioned just now by the minister was the report of the joint consulting committee. I am sorry this report was not made available to the members of the Legislature. I have not seen copies of it, but I believe that were that information given by that committee to the people who wrote the Wyatt report, it would have been good if the details also had been made available to the members of this Legislature, so they could also have examined them and had further input.

As our leader mentioned on Monday when this bill was put forward, he was quite upset that we were not made privy to the information that there are sufficient funds in the Workmen's Compensation Fund to fund these increases. I am a little upset, as I know all of our members are, that the funding that is made available to the Workmen's Compensation Board is not done more on an annual basis as is recommended by the Wyatt report. One of the recommendations calls for an annual audit by the superintendent of insurance of Ontario and for full, clear disclosure of the WCB's financial condition in each annual statement. This is one thing which I would like to see enacted when we go into a study of the Wyatt report and the study of the WCB bill.

We are also a little bit upset, as I mentioned, about the timing of Bill 126. It was introduced on June 19; we are giving it second reading today, the 22nd. It really has not left us adequate time for consideration, to make a study of the Wyatt report, and it is my understanding that the minister will give to this Legislature her commitment that, when we return in the fall, the members, possibly through a committee of all members of the Legislature, will be able to sit down and have a look at the Wyatt report and also look over the WCB Act to look at further changes.

I know there may be some discussion as to whether these amounts are good enough to cover different areas of compensation that we run into, whether they may concern single-parent families, widows or children. There may be discussion on that by some of the members later this afternoon. I feel it is important that we see that this bill is passed through the Legislature so these benefits will be available by July 1 for the people who are on compensation, by so they will get these increases. That is the most important thing—that these increases be made available to them.

In the fall when we reconvene we may have a look at the Wyatt report and the act.

We will have had a chance to have examined in detail the recommendations, to see the ones we agree with and the ones we disagree with. Possibly at that time there will be some change in the benefit levels and the things that are made available to these people on compensation.

So the minister can look at it, I would mention one of the things that gives us a bit of problem, even with this bill. I don't believe the bill really deals with those people who have lump sum payments after 75. We believe that, in some cases, people received lump sum payments because they were in dire difficulty and needed the money right away. I wonder if I could have the minister's comments before we go into this bill, section by section, as to whether she believes that they also should receive these increases. As I say, we are not completely happy with some of the things in the bill. It does give these people increases, and it will give it to them shortly. If it is retroactive for the period of the last three years, when they did not receive increases, then we will be supporting this bill.

Mr. Bounsell: It feels like old times to have a bill increasing the pension benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Board before us in the last day or two of session, before we break in June or July. This has been the pattern in 1974, 1975 and I have come to expect it. I was, of course, upset that these pensions were not adjusted in 1976 and in 1977. We're here in 1978 making all these back adjustments—moneys which should have and could have been already in the hands of the injured workers in the province of Ontario.

I suppose it's like past history. The bills usually come in with about as much time to look at them as we had this time. In addition, we had the Wyatt report which examined the financial structure of the board and laid before us some of the philosophy for some of the changes that appear in this bill. Certainly the maximums that will be paid out cause me some concern and I will speak at some greater length on that, either in this debate or when we get to the committee stage.

I'm sort of used to doing a lot of work in a rather short time so the data presented to us causes me no concern. All it means is that when it does come up, one loses a little bit of sleep. That's fair game. So I have no complaint about the bill being debated shortly after its introduction, nor that the bill was accompanied by the 500-page Wyatt report which also needed some digestion.

This is par for the course and I would sooner have this bill in which pensions are adjusted, even with the short time to think about it before debate, than not have it at all. I would have preferred to have had debates in 1976 and 1977 in the month of June, rather than waiting until 1978. However, this bill does make adjustments to pensions backdated to those other two periods.

Of the bill, I can say we will support it. We will have amendments to the bill and some of those amendments need not take all that long to discuss. So there is no way the bill won't come into effect for July 1, 1978, with the backdating of pensions which flow from that bill. We anticipate no problem with that at all.

However, there are two or three points in the bill that do disturb me. One, of course, is the widows' pensions. The minister, the ministry, and the Workmen's Compensation Board know my thoughts in this matter from previous speeches on bills, particularly in 1975. I see no rationale whatsoever for the widows' pensions to be any different from those pensions paid to the permanently 100 per cent disabled workers. It seems to me that if a worker gets sufficiently disabled that he is killed in the work place—and that is a pretty substantial disablement—the pension paid to the widow cannot be and should not be identical to those outlined in the bill for the permanently disabled.

For some years from 1971 on those amounts were equivalent; they were equivalent in the amendments of 1974. In 1975, we moved off that and substantially adjusted the amounts for the permanently disabled and increased the amount of the widow's pension, but only by the 10 per cent cost of living adjustment which was made to all of the other pensions. That principle which seemed to have applied—although for years before the early '70s it didn't apply—and to have become thoroughly established and which, when talked about received no negative comments or denials from the board or from the various Labour ministers that that was what they had done, was abandoned in 1975. That principle should be reinstated now without fail.

Hence our amendment in this section would replace the widow's pension amounts by what is in the bill; they are increased by the percentages which are used in the bill to the amount equivalent to those pensions paid to the fully disabled worker. Again I stress the philosophy of this. How much more fully disabled could a worker be than one who is killed in the work place? He leaves a survivor who should get the pension that a fully disabled worker should and would receive, if he had stopped just shy of death in the work place. It makes such eminent sense that I can't see why we are fiddling around with any other smaller numbers. I just cannot see the justification of it.

One can always argue that there is a cost factor involved. There is a cost factor involved in all of these. For that matter, there aren't that many widows and widowers in the province that to give them the amount of pension equal to the pension for the fully disabled would cause much strain on the resources of the Workmen's Compensation Board.

Of the total pensions paid out by the Workmen's Compensation Board, a figure roughly around 55,000, the widows and widowers' category includes less than 5,000 recipients. About eight per cent of the pensions paid out are paid out to the widow or widower category. There are not many in the widower category; I think the number can be counted on the fingers of both hands. The category is mainly widows. They are mainly women who, following the traditional situation women find themselves in, usually haven't had much opportunity to acquire skills or haven't practised their skills in the work place. Certainly they very much need the full pension accorded to a fully-disabled worker.

The group is small in number. The minister really can't argue, therefore, with any great strength that this would put the board under financial constraints if those widows' pensions were increased from what is in the bill—for example, from $318 a month—to the level for the fully disabled, which should be $448—in the bill it is $444. I would ask the minister and the members of the Liberal Party to consider very seriously that this is one defective area of the bill and to support our amendment in this regard.

In terms of widows' pensions, if one looks at it there are various ways one can approach the matter. We will not try to make amendments in this particular bill to the philosophy which would treat widows and widowers somewhat differently. Perhaps we can look forward to a year from now when we get the next bill changing the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Board so we don't have to wait for years thereafter. We expect that next June at the latest.

Perhaps the minister, with the Wyatt report in hand, could consider various changes with respect to widows and widowers. Just in Canada alone, there are various ways in which the widow and widower category is handled.

Saskatchewan pays 100 per cent pension for the first five years, making an assumption that this will enable the spouse to adapt, retrain, and re-enter the work force. And knowing that the 100 per cent pension will not pertain after the five-year period, this certainly gives the widowed time for adjustment and retraining.

After that five-year period, the pension does not go to zero. There is a real figure in Saskatchewan's bill. As of more than a year ago, this figure was $300 a month, which was certainly more than we have had up to that point, which was only $286. I hope that the minister will consider this as one of the methods we could follow to treat the widow and widower category in this province.

Manitoba pays a 100 per cent pension to widows or widowers. This is reduced by what is called a dependency factor: if the widow or widower was fully dependent upon the person who was killed in the work place, they receive the full pension. If the widow or widower was, in fact, working half time, for example, at the time of death in the work place, then consideration is given to reducing the pension by 50 per cent. They apply this rather nice dependency factor, which I don't think is too complicated. It recognizes, and really encourages, the working of the widow or widower of the person killed in the work place so that one doesn't feel forever dependent and tied for the rest of one's life. And this could happen at a very early stage in life, and the widow or widower could be constantly reminded of it.

Australia has various categories of widows and widowers—class A and class B. I won't go into the ins and outs. I am sure the minister and the board know about those situations.

We would certainly be willing to consider changes in philosophy in the act so that widows and widowers are rewarded more than they have been under our acts, and are thus provided with some sort of incentive and encouragement to retrain and get into the work place.

Perhaps the minister would note this in response. I was quite intrigued by the percentages by which the pensions were changed in this act, and it followed that the same percentages, of course, were used throughout. I looked up the consumer price index, as well as the average salaries and wages index changes that have occurred in various years, and looked at the actual percentage figures placed in the bill. As a result, I am not able to conclude just what exactly the minister or the board were doing in picking the particular figure they did.

The consumer price index in the year 1975 showed an increase of 10 per cent. The increase in the average salaries and wages was 12 per cent. Neither figure was picked. Eleven per cent was picked. You say, "Ah, there is a pattern emerging! The minister is taking those two indices and splitting the difference, so she got 11 per cent."

You look at 1976, where the consumer price index was a six per cent increase, and the percentage increase in salaries and wages was 10 per cent. The minister, inexplicably, picked eight. But you see the pattern following—she split the difference. Eight is the difference between the six and the 10.

You say, Mr. Speaker, "Well, there's the clear pattern emerging. There's the mix of the consumer price index and percentage increase in the average salaries and wages. That is what the minister is doing." That's fine, if that's the principle on which it were done. We would accept that without question; there is some rationale for those percentage changes. Except when you now get to the year 1976, for which the pensions are to be adjusted by July 1, 1978, the consumer price index increase was 14 per cent, and the increase in salaries and wages was six per cent. The ministry and the board increased it only by six per cent and the whole pattern is lost. There is no rationale there whatsoever.

One wonders if there were any rationale for the other two years, because the difference between the six and 14, of course, is eight, half of which is four; so that increase should have been 10 per cent, if that rationale were followed.

We were not therefore able to detect any rationale. We would have settled for and not moved, as we have done, one iota of change in any of these pension rates as laid out in the bill if the changes had been that rationalized change, as we might have observed from the first two years—11, eight, followed by 10; rather than 11, eight and then choosing the lower of those two indices.

I am one of those persons who likes to see rationale used when it comes to choosing percentage changes for pensions. I would like to be convinced that some rationale was used—and if so what?—in the choosing of that six per cent adjustment for the year 1977. However, having looked at that and observed what I thought was a trend, which completely fell apart for 1977, I am left with the question, if I were making the choice, what would I do? What would I propose for the percentage increase on the benefit levels as contained in this bill?

I wasn't unhappy with what the minister had done, or appeared to have done at one point, choosing half of the difference, a 50-50 mix of the percentage increase in CPI and average salaries and wages. One simply could have proposed that the first two years be fine, as those increases were, and in the following year have that mix at 10 per cent. If the minister would say that's the rationale she and the board would like to be using, that also would be completely acceptable to this political party and to me.

However, not being at all confident, because of what happened for the 1977 year adjustment, that that was the rationale used, again we come back to the point of what, in fact, should have been used. I have argued ever since I came into the Legislature in 1971 that workmen's compensation clearly is a scheme by which the decrease in workers' income as a result of injuries in the work place should be compensated for, if one is going to make any adjustment at all on pensions, that adjustment should not be according to the consumer price index, but according to the average salaries and wages, the industrial composite, in the province of Ontario.

One can make a very rational argument for that to be the case. This is the one pension, this is the one benefit above all others which should be tied to per cent increases in salaries and wages. That's always been the rationale which I have used, and therefore, I again choose to stick with that rationale since the ministry doesn't seem to have any clearly emerging rationale itself.

Mr. Laughren: There is the embarrassed Minister of Revenue (Mr. Maeck).

Mr. Bounsall: The adjustments I would have made on those pension levels would have been 12 per cent in the year 1975, rather than the 11 in the bill; 10 per cent for the year 1976, rather than the eight per cent that's in the bill; and in the year 1977 I would agree with the six per cent that is contained within the bill, knowing full well that six per cent increase in the salary and wages for the year 1977 is well below the consumer price index increase of 14 per cent.

That is an indication of the effect of the Anti-Inflation Board and its non-operation in our society where salaries and wages went up only six per cent and consumer price index has gone up 14 per cent. It shows the total inoperability of justice being achieved through that Anti-Inflation Board. In the amendments which I have tabled the minister and the staff of the Workmen's Compensation Board will see that I've simply made what turns out to be a rather small monetary adjustment on the numbers as indicated on the bill to give and put in place the proper rationale for what those changes are.

Instead of having 11, eight and six we are proposing 12, 10 and six, with a cumulative effect of around 30 per cent over that three-year period, as opposed to the ministry's proposal which has a cumulative effect of around a 27 per cent increase.

Those differences aren't very much. We needn't argue about those differences. What I would like to really talk about and be convinced about is the minister's rationale. Let's get it on the proper rationale, which in my terms should be the percentage increase in the average salaries and wages.

I know the ministry did not have the Wyatt report in their hands for very many days—I guess it was in unbound form when it eventually arrived in the minister's hands by the end of the first week in June. However, having had it at least since then, the people at the board serving on that review committee, knowing full well the problems, should have built into the legislation an automatic adjustment at this time. Then we wouldn't have to have before us each June—or hopefully each June, for it has not happened in the last two years—a bill requiring those changes to be made.

Of course, our amendment follows the philosophy that on July 1 each year there shall be an adjustment on all of the benefits equal to the percentage increase in salaries and wages that have occurred up to December 31 of the previous year—so by July 1, 1979, there would be an absolutely automatic adjustment of those pensions equivalent to whatever the percentage increase in salaries and wages was in Ontario for this year, 1978.

Those figures would be available from Statistics Canada within the first two to three months of any calendar year. It would give the board, therefore, sufficient time between then and July 1 to make all of those adjustments. Then the adjusted cheques could go out by July 1 as the legislation, if amended as we see it, would so indicate and empower the minister to do without coming before us.

We will get into much more detail in some of the arguments as we go through the bill clause by clause. But one of the things which also disturbed me very much about this bill was the maximum amount on which the salary could be calculated. I have read thoroughly that part of the Wyatt report indicating there should be no adjustment to the maximum. Some of the rationale is that it is those persons who are at or near the maximum who are the most advantaged anyway.

The 25 per cent at that level are those who are paying more than 25 per cent of their income in income tax. Therefore, they are the ones, rather than all the lower salaried workers, who are receiving a benefit. Those who are less salaried are not, by that 75 per cent non-taxable payment on which their compensation is initially calculated and then their pensions based.

But it takes the wrong approach and draws the wrong conclusions. We have argued and suggested in estimates before, particularly the estimates dealing with the Workmen's Compensation Board two years ago. We got into that whole problem rather heavily concerning who is disadvantaged when that compensation is 75 per cent non-taxable of the average earnings. Certainly, it's most discriminatory against the low-income worker and persons with large families. The person who gets the most advantage from it is the high-income person at the maximum, particularly if that person does not have a family. And I quite appreciate that there is no way we, in the province of Ontario, should have to increase our collections from employers in order to pay out a taxable benefit to workers so that money can then be paid out to the federal government.

I believe that the initial approach worked out with the federal government, that these pensions should be non-taxable, is a correct one in terms of having a lower levy to our employers in Ontario. But what should be applied now, and the board has the sophistication to do it without question, is a sliding scale of what percentage, related to their salary and their dependants, should be paid on compensation.

In response to those estimates discussions of a couple of years ago, the board gave out a very interesting document subsequently. For a fair number of salaries categories and for those with no dependants and those with various numbers of dependants within those salary levels, the document indicated how long each of those persons must be on compensation before they started to become advantaged or disadvantaged.

It was an interesting document because, if I recall, the major breakpoint was around nine months and most of the people on compensation do not stay on compensation that long. But you still have this group of long-term workers, small in number, who are off the job longer than nine months, in those lower salary categories who, in point of fact, should be dealt with more fairly than the present blanket of 75 per cent non-taxable we now have. Those workers, I think, should be on a sliding scale that deals with that equitably and which takes away the major point made by Wyatt in the report: why we should not increase the maximums in the act.

By increasing the maximums only the small amount in the act, from $15,000 to $16,200, some very real problems are caused. There's a section in the bill where I have some difficulty understanding exactly what it was accomplishing and I'm not sure that it accomplishes it. Maybe we can set that aside as we go through it in committee and see if there is any possibility of changing those maximums in section 5 of the bill.

It will create a situation where, if someone is receiving the percentage increases in their pension, they will end up receiving more than a newly injured worker, injured after July 1, 1978, because the maximums aren't increased to the point they should be.

There's a section in the bill at the bottom of page three and continuing to the top of page four which I had difficulty interpreting after several readings. That section is supposed to take care of that. It says no worker injured prior to July 1, 1978, can have his pension adjusted by those percentages outlined in the bill in such a way that he or she would receive more than someone who was injured after July 1, 1978. By so doing, we are seriously disadvantaging those workers who should be, according to justice, receiving those pension increases which are due to them. Because of the salaries they made at the time of the injury they are not going to get the 27 per cent cumulative total outlined in this bill, nor the roughly 30 per cent cumulative total which we are proposing for the bill. They are to be stopped from receiving them.

I'm not sure that's what the section is trying to achieve; I'm not sure that the wording of it actually achieves it, but that's the effect of it. That should simply not be in there.

I would say to the minister that we have always had a problem in there being any maximums at all in the bill on which average earnings can be calculated and compensation paid. We believe very strongly that everyone should be treated the same and treated justly. Why should someone who becomes injured in a work place injury, who is earn-

There was no problem in the last adjustment we made in 1975 because we increased the maximum from $12,000 to $15,000, which was a greater increase than the increase in the pension. We didn't have the problem of workers having a pension adjustment being in danger of receiving more than a worker injured post July 1, 1975. By increasing it by the small amount we have done, we have workers in that situation who will not, therefore, be able to receive the additional pension.

As a minimum, if one is not going to take off any maximum amount in the bill, which I feel should be done for simple justice's sake, the pension maximums must be adjusted to alleviate that problem by the exact amount as whatever percentage we choose to use in this bill. Either what is in the bill or what we propose should be increased by that identical amount over that three-year period and each year over that three-year period. That is one of the positions which could be taken. That could be a formula used in which thereafter the maximums should be increased by the same percentage by which the pensions are increased, so that we don't find ourselves in that very much disadvantages situation.

The final point I would like to make in the debate is that one of the continuing concerns for any worker who is injured, be he on compensation for some months who then recovers and is able to return to the work place or if he ends up not being able to return to the work place, is that unemployment insurance and Canada Pension cannot be paid for them. They cannot pay it, and no mechanism has been found by which it can be paid for them.

I would strongly suggest to the minister and to the Workmen's Compensation Board, whatever it takes to work out with the federal government, while a worker is recovering from an injury, it is reasonable for the worker to have unemployment insurance paid for him so that he is not in danger of losing UIC earnings and that Canada Pension Plan contributions should be made for him as part of his pension benefits as an add-on, so that he is not losing cumulative pension benefits. Whatever needs to be worked out with the federal government should be worked out so that that can be paid for injured workers, at least while they are on compensation.

Perhaps it could be worked out that a payment could be made on their behalf on their pension award as well. But at least for those on compensation that should be worked out and be paid as an additional amount and not as a deduction from the compensation to be received nor the pensions they are receiving. It should be paid on behalf of the workers.

This is a continuing source of questions from and a continuing source of frustration of injured workers who are on compensation for any length of time. It should be possible to work it out. It is not impossible, I am sure. It should be done.

Mr. McClellan: Mr. Speaker, this bill, An Act to amend the Workmen's Compensation Act, to restore the loss in purchasing power to injured workers as a result of the government's failure to raise the rates since 1975, ends one of the sorriest chapters in this province's recent past. It has been a source of shame and disgrace to Ontario. It has been a scandal that the injured workers in Ontario have been forced to bear the brunt of a callous and cruel restraint program; that injured workers have been singled out for this kind of punitive treatment; that injured workers alone, of all other sectors of our society, have been denied a cost-of-living increase for almost three years.

The fact that the bill comes today is a source of some satisfaction to us. It is not a cause for gratitude, however, because we do not have to express gratitude when our constituents' rights are acknowledged and recognized and accorded. It's not a question of charity that's being bestowed by a government on a group of people. It is a question of the recognition by government of the legitimate rights of injured workers to decent pensions and adequate compensation and adequate protection against the ravages of inflation.

Mr. Lupusella: You never used the word "rights."

Mr. McClellan: It is the epitome, the very essence, of bad government when problems are allowed to go unattended and grievances are allowed to continue unredressed. In this instance, the failure of the government to adjust the compensation rates has led to civil disobedience. It has led to violent clashes with the police. It has led to violence. It has led to charges being laid and court proceedings being initiated.

That is what bad government is all about: when decent, hard-working people are unable to have their legitimate rights acknowledged by government and they turn, in desperation, to other ways of drawing attention to their plight. That's exactly what has happened in this situation with respect to this government's failure to raise the compensation rates. It has led to violence and to confrontation.

I hope that never happens again in Ontario.

Mr. Laughren: It never needs to happen.

Mr. McClellan: It should never have happened and it need not happen. I say to my colleagues in the Liberal Party that I hope we can amend the legislation to include automatic indexing in the Workmen's Compensation Act so that injured workers will be granted the statutory protection, to which they are entitled, against the loss of purchasing power as a result of the ravages of inflation.

I want to speak very briefly to four points with respect to this bill. I haven't had adequate time, as none of us has had, to fully read the Wyatt report. I regard it as an important document. It covers every aspect of the Workmen's Compensation program. It deserves very close and detailed study, and it will receive that study. But on the basis of a very quick and cursory reading of the Wyatt report, I have a number of observations that I want to make. I make them tentatively, but I believe that the observations are valid.

In the first place, we have to recognize something I'm not sure the Wyatt report recognizes or my colleagues in the Liberal Party recognize, that the workmen's compensation program is not a welfare program; it's an insurance program. Like any other insurance program it has to be operated on insurance principles. That means that, like any other insurance program, it has to have a liability fund which is solvent. The reality is that the Workmen's Compensation Board has an unfunded liability according to the Wyatt report of $682 million as of December 1976.

When members of this House say the money was in the accident fund all the time to raise the rates, they are making a fundamental confusion between a welfare program and an insurance program. The fact is that the compensation board does not have sufficient funds in the accident fund to cover its liability.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the honourable member would find this a convenient place to break his remarks. By previous agreement we were to revert to routine proceedings at 2 o'clock.

On motion by Mr. McClellan, the debate was adjourned.

LEGISLATIVE PAGES

Mr. Speaker: Before I call ministerial statements and in keeping with past practice, in order to acknowledge the excellent service provided us by the legislative pages I'm going to read their names and their ridings into the record:

Ruth Boehm, Waterloo North; Maureen Bracewell, Scarborough North; Douglas Carroll, Scarborough-Ellesmere; Stephen Dunne, Mississauga South; Penny-Lynn Fielding, Sudbury East; Virginia Gallop, Beaches-Woodbine; Lyn Gregory, Perth; Patrick Grier, Lakeshore; Laura Houston, Northumberland; Ian Jeans, Brant-Oxford-Norfolk; Douglas Jones, Scarborough North; Amanda Kelman, Quinte; Wendy McKee, Mississauga South; Kristy McKittrick, Simcoe East; Ross McKittrick, Simcoe East; Chris Miller, Lake Nipigon; Adam Schatz, London South; Monique Smith, Nipissing; Geoffrey Terrill, Victoria-Haliburton; Lisa White, Dufferin-Simcoe; Stuart Wright, Simcoe Centre; and Konrad Yakubuski, Renfrew South.

I'm sure all members would like to join with me in thanking this excellent group of pages for their services during the past six weeks.

Mr. Nixon: If they'd been much better we would have had to pay them.

STATEMENTS BY THE MINISTRY

QUEBEC POLICY ON CONSTRUCTION HIRING

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am tabling today two letters that were sent from my office yesterday. The first is to the Prime Minister, the second to the Premier of Quebec. The letter to the Prime Minister asks the government of Canada to initiate a reference under the Supreme Court Act in regard to regulation OC 3282 which has been enacted under the province of Quebec's Construction Industry Labour Relations Act.

This regulation, as members of this House are aware, will deny a substantial number of Ontario residents, particularly those who reside in areas close to the Quebec-Ontario boundary, employment opportunities in construction trades for which they are fully qualified and to which, we believe, they are fully entitled.

We believe that there are serious doubts as to the constitutionality of the Quebec regulation and, having due regard for the manner in which issues of this kind can be properly challenged, we have asked the federal government to place the matter before the Supreme Court of Canada—an action in which we shall readily join in our attempt to remedy what we regard as a totally unacceptable situation.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, later today the Minister of Labour will introduce for first reading, and, quite frankly, as an indication of our determination, a bill that is intended to protect Ontario workers, given the Quebec regulation. However, it would not be our intention to proceed with this legislation until the decision regarding a court reference is made or until the court rules in the matter. Nevertheless, we feel it is necessary to indicate, and clearly, that we take this matter seriously and we do not intend to have this province or its citizens placed at a disadvantage because of the actions of another provincial government.

As I indicated in my letter to Mr. Levesque, I regret that such action has been found to be necessary. It was my belief, following my recent discussions with him in Toronto, that an acceptable solution could be found. Towards this end, the Minister of Labour has discussed the matter on a number of occasions with her counterpart in Quebec. Despite those discussions, the Quebec position has not changed. The Quebec minister has explained that the intention of the regulation is to give the Quebec government more effective control over the construction industry in that province, and that it is not deliberately intended to penalize Ontario residents.

Whatever the purpose of the regulation, however, the end result for Ontario workers remains the same and as a result is unacceptable to us. I repeat that while the message has been communicated on a number of occasions, including my own conversations with Mr. Levesque, we feel that no acceptable modifications in the regulation have been proposed.

In defence of its position, Quebec has referred to provisions in the regulation allowing the issuance of special permits to non-residents, including Ontarians, who are members of an employer's "regular work force." However, the definition of "regular work force" is left to the uncontrolled discretion of Quebec officials. Moreover, we have been told that the concept will be limited to "key men" who have lengthy periods of continuous employment with a single employer. Hence, this so-called exemption provision provides no relief to Ontario tradesmen who cannot meet these stringent service requirements.

I have been assured, however, that while the regulation becomes effective July 1, Ontario residents working on Quebec construction projects will be permitted to continue to work at least until the projects are completed.

Nevertheless, since these transitional arrangements obviously do not provide the permanent solution which we are seeking, we feel that relevantly quick action is required on our request for a court reference.

I sincerely regret that we have had to proceed along the lines I have outlined. It is, quite frankly, a sad day when it is necessary to ask our courts to reaffirm the rights of Canadian citizens to live and work wherever they wish in this country and to consider legislation as a self-protective measure that seems contrary to the principle of free movement of our citizens. Further, it is unfortunate that such a matter of mutual interest cannot be settled fairly and amicably between two provinces when the circumstances are fully understood, and when our sister province has indicated on numerous occasions its desire to resolve this type of problem through direct discussion.

I have no reservation in stating, however, that the failure to find an acceptable solution does not result from either a lack of effort or a necessary degree of flexibility of thinking in the province of Ontario. In conclusion, let me emphasize the importance of the closing comment in my letter to the Quebec Premier. Despite the requested court reference, and the legislation that has been prepared, we continue to stand ready to discuss this matter with Quebec officials in an attempt to find an acceptable arrangement. It is my hope that he will respond to that suggestion, since it should now be clear that while Ontario wants to resolve this matter in an acceptable fashion, we will not accept the consequences of this regulation as it currently stands, and we are prepared to take the necessary steps to ensure fairness and equity for construction workers in Canada and to protect, to the full, the rights of our Ontario citizens.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I have another statement to make. Two days ago in the House of Commons, Prime Minister Trudeau unveiled the specifics of the federal government's proposals for constitutional reform when he introduced for first reading legislation entitled the Constitutional Amendment Bill, 1978. The proposals contained in the federal bill are complex both in substance and procedure and will, therefore, require a careful analysis to ascertain their implications and effects, both nationally and on Ontario. For this reason I believe it would be premature to try to provide time in the House and to give the House a comprehensive or definitive reaction on all aspects of the proposal at this time.

There are some aspects of the bill that upon initial reflection give rise to questions if not concerns, in our minds at least. For example—and these are only examples—I wonder about limited assurances of Ontario-based appointments on the Supreme Court of Canada, about the degree of Ontario representation in the proposed House of the Federation and the functions of that House and about the proposed relationship between the monarchy and the office of the Governor General.

I am also concerned about the lack of pre-consultation on the proposed charter of rights and freedoms, given the specific references to Ontario in that section of the bill. But these matters, I assume, can be fully discussed as part of the consultative process which the Prime Minister has requested.

In looking at the federal proposal I might reiterate the three main areas of national priority that I set out in my remarks to the task force on national unity last November. These priorities, which are just as valid today, are a major concerted effort by the federal and provincial governments to create the right economic climate to permit the private sector to foster growth and development; a reform of the practices of federalism to reduce the kind and degree of overlap and conflict in the policies and programs of the two levels of government, a technique which we have termed disentanglement; and my references to constitutional change.

As we head into what undoubtedly will be a strenuous period of constitutional discussions, I would simply repeat my concern that economic progress and constitutional progress must go hand in hand. The initial steps towards economic recovery that the first ministers took last February cannot be forgotten or ignored as we review suggestions about the constitution. There are economic priorities which must be pursued and economic decisions which must be made if the needs and expectations of Canadians are to be satisfactorily met.

I am pleased that in its white paper, A Time for Action, the federal government has adopted disentanglement as an objective of national policy. As I have had occasion to argue many times over the past three years, we can no longer afford the waste in human and financial resources that comes from both levels of government becoming involved in the same area of responsibility. The public confusion and intergovernmental conflicts which result makes our federal system more difficult to operate effectively. I look forward to discussion with my fellow Premiers later this summer and with the Prime Minister in the fall how we can minimize this kind of duplication.

I am also pleased that an attempt has been made in the federal constitutional proposals to incorporate a number of the goals for constitutional reform that I set out in my task force statement. While I can thus agree with what the federal government is attempting to do in such matters as making a national commitment to the reduction of economic disparities and improving intergovernmental consultation, it will require more detailed consideration before I can say whether I agree with the techniques chosen to implement these objectives.

I particularly welcome the concept in the bill aimed at the strengthening of the Canadian common market, given the type of problems and difficulties which are clearly underlined in my previous statement.

One of the objectives of constitutional reform that I particularly emphasized last November was the need to find ways of integrating federal and provincial actions at the national level. In this way, the federal government would obtain a better appreciation of provincial and regional concerns and thus be in a better position to provide effective national leadership. It is against this objective, among others, that I shall be measuring the Prime Minister's proposals, including a House of the Federation.

I want it to be very clear that this government will participate in the upcoming constitutional discussions in a positive and cooperative manner. Constitutional reform has been discussed for a very long time indeed. Whether we are any closer to a result this time will, I think, in large measure depend on the will of all concerned to strengthen this country.

I cannot emphasize too strongly that a constitution must be understood and accepted by the people who are governed by it, and this is especially so in a federal state. It is therefore not something that can be imposed and its ultimate legitimacy will depend on the degree of consensus and agreement that can be generated across this country.

To this end, Mr. Speaker, I look forward to the opportunity to make a constructive contribution to this process on behalf of the people and the government of Ontario.

TEACHERS' QUALIFICATIONS

Hon. Mr. Wells: Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the members of the House of a new regulation which is to come into effect on July 1, 1978, and which will affect all Ontario teachers, past, present and future.

The Ontario teacher's qualification regulation brings together all the regulations dealing with teaching qualifications. It will result in a new standardized certificate for teachers as well as a much more convenient method of recording each teacher's earned qualifications.

At the present time, there are about 500 different teaching certificates existing in Ontario—basic certificates of various types, limited basic certificates and many specialist certificates and certificates leading to specialist certificates—some of which are no longer issued, although they are still valid. Confusion and difficulties created for teachers by this proliferation of certificates have been on the increase.

This situation will now be streamlined and simplified, since all the required details regarding a teacher's qualifications will be brought together on two forms: the Ontario teacher's certificate and the Ontario teacher's qualifications record card.

The certificate itself is quite different from what exists at present. It is in English and French, and it is designed for framing as is the practice in most other professions. This certificate is the only one to be issued henceforth to teachers in Ontario. It indicates that the bearer is qualified to teach in Ontario schools. It will be issued not only to new graduates of teacher education programs, but also to all practising teachers and others who hold basic teaching certificates—elementary, secondary, vocational or occupational.

The Ontario teacher's qualification record card will give each teacher a complete and convenient record of his or her qualifications on one handy form.

It is important to stress, Mr. Speaker, that presently qualified teachers do not lose anything by this new Certification policy. All previously-earned basic certificates are deemed to be equivalent to the new one—and all other qualifications that have been earned previously will continue to be valid and will be recorded on the record card.

The idea of a single certificate has been under study by the Ministry of Education for about seven years. Along the way, and especially during the past year or two, there has been on-going consultation with various key education organizations, including the Ontario Teachers' Federation and its affiliates; the Ontario School Trustees' Council and member organizations; the Ontario Association of Educational Administrative Officials; the Ontario Catholic Supervisory Officers' Association, l'Association des surintendants franco-ontariens; the deans of teacher education institutions; and other interested groups.

This consultation, and the advice gained from it, has been of considerable assistance in refining the concept and working out the procedures for implementing the new system. Because the new system directly affects every teacher in Ontario, a special folder was prepared in order to explain the details and to answer questions about the new policy. During the past week these have been distributed throughout the province, and they are now in all schools, and one is available for every teacher in this province.

We expect by the end of March, 1979, all practising teachers and principals will have received their new certificates and record card. All other teachers will be able to obtain their new documents by writing directly to the Ministry of Education.

I might say that I, as a special service to the members of this House, have provided all the members who hold teaching certificates with their new certificates today, and they will receive them in a few minutes.

An hon. member: Is yours still up to date?

Mr. Roy: Signed by his own hand.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That means the whole NDP caucus.

Mr. Conway: The parliamentary guide makes this place look like a teachers' college. We need more students in here.

Hon. Mr. Davis: It's about time you did your share to provide more students, Sean.

Mr. Breithaupt: Spoken as a true lawyer.

Mr. S. Smith: How do you know he hasn't?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I thought from the first part of the statement that he meant something else.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Transportation and Communications has the floor, without a certificate.

Hon. Mr. Snow: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I'm sorry I'm not obtaining one of those certificates today.

Mr. Roy: So are we, Jim.

Mr. Foulds: Have you got your driver's licence, Jim?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

URBAN TRANSPORTATION DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Hon. Mr. Snow: On June 2, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. S. Smith) asked me to provide him with certain non-proprietary information about the intermediate capacity transit system. Specifically, he asked for information about the cost schedule and achievements to date.

At that time also, the leader of the New Democratic Party suggested that this information should be provided during the discussion of my ministry's estimates. I agreed that this would be an appropriate time.

However, MTC's estimates will not be presented until the fall session of the Legislature. Therefore, because of this delay, today I would like to respond to those requests for information and table the appropriate back-up documents.

The first is the financial statement of the Urban Transportation Development Corporation for the year ending December 31, 1977. The second is the information about ICTS, which would have been provided by Mr. Kirk Foley, president of the corporation, had he appeared before the estimates committee as planned.

I would like to take a further few moments to present a brief explanation of several of the tables that appear at the end of the report.

In table one, budget expenditure reconciliation, column three is derived from a periodic management report produced by a computer and is supplied to UTDC executives by the project team. This report forecasts the accumulated costs without reflecting any technical or management action. Its purpose is to allow technical managers to take appropriate action to optimize the allocation of funds among the various technical tasks and still remain within the budget. By design, this forecast uses up all available contingencies in the program.

Column four of table one reflects the results of the technical managers' actions to achieve these twin goals of maximizing technical results and controlling expenditures. This column, therefore, represents UTDC's current—as of May 1, 1978—estimated cost to complete the project.

It should be noted that reference is made to non-budgeted expenditures relating to foreign exchange costs resulting from the drop in the Canadian dollar and to an increase of $500,000 of tax liability to the federal government which resulted from the change in October of last year of the federal-provincial tax sharing agreement.

I would also like to point out that an updated status report and schedule is included in tables two and three.

DUMP TRUCK LICENCES

Hon. Mr. Snow: Mr. Speaker, I have another short statement I would like to make today. As a result of one of the recommendations in the report of the select committee on highway transportation of goods last October, I advised this House that I had requested the Ontario Highway Transport Board to implement a restriction, or type of moratorium on the granting of class R, or dump truck, licences, except in cases of significant urgency. It was a move aimed at stabilizing the supply of licensed carriers and a move which followed a lengthy and in-depth examination of the supply by both the OHTB and my ministry staff.

This moratorium—and I believe I referred to it as a type of moratorium—was enforced after careful scrutiny of the need for any additional services and has been carefully implemented by the board over the past eight months. As a result, at the end of March of this year there were 9,457 type R-licensed vehicles as compared to 9,717 the previous year.

I have recently been made aware that there may be possible shortages of licensed dump trucks in some specific areas of the province, such as Sarnia, Kitchener-Waterloo, Windsor and sections of northwestern Ontario.

Based on the information available to me at this time, I have asked the OHTB to review the need for additional dump truck services in those areas, while keeping in mind the fact that every application must still be strictly assessed on the public necessity and convenience criteria.

INTERJECTION BY MEMBER

Mr. Speaker: On a point of privilege, the honourable member for Wilson Heights.

Mr. Rotenberg: Mr. Speaker, in this morning's Globe and Mail there was a statement attributed to the member for Sudbury East (Mr. Martel) which described me in language that is both insulting and unparliamentary.

Hon. Mr. Bernier: Again?

Mr. Martel: Still.

Mr. Rotenberg: This did not appear in the official records of this House. It was stated to be an interjection. I did not hear the interjection being made and, therefore I haven't raised this matter previously. However, it does appear in this morning's Globe and Mail attributed to the member for Sudbury East.

Hon. Mr. Bernier: Resign.

Mr. Rotenberg: I would ask him, if the quote is incorrect, just simply to indicate that he didn't say it and I'll be satisfied. However, if he did make the quotation I would ask that he apologize and withdraw the remark.

Mr. Martel: I did say it.

Hon. Mr. Bernier: Resign.

Mr. Martel: Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I believe I made the statement as a response to the member's comments that the New Democratic Party hated all Americans, which was a fabrication of his. I don't intend to withdraw it. Because of the type of comment he made, he deserved the entitlement.

Hon. Mr. Bernier: Shame.

Mr. Rotenberg: Mr. Speaker, in that case, as the remark was made, I would ask you to take into consideration whether the remark is a parliamentary remark or not or whether it is a word that should be used in this House.

Mr. Makarchuk: What did he say? Tell us?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It becomes a matter of judgement on behalf of the chair as to whether a remark such as that is parliamentary or unparliamentary. We don't have a catalogue of those remarks that are considered acceptable and those that are unacceptable.

Mr. Deans: You soon will.

Mr. Speaker: Since it is not a part of the official record of this House, I'm not in a position to say whether or not it is acceptable. There is no need to withdraw it. It doesn't appear in the official Hansard.

Mr. Martel: I will put it back in then.

Mr. Rotenberg: Mr. Speaker, with respect, it does not appear in the official record. It does appear in public in a newspaper. The member has indicated that he has made that remark in the House.

Mr. Makarchuk: What did he call you?

Mr. Mackenzie: Does the truth hurt?

Mr. Rotenberg: Mr. Speaker, I think there should be, though maybe not at this time, a ruling as to whether that type of language is acceptable in this House. It has been made in the House.

Mr. Peterson: It was a compliment.

Mr. Speaker: If the honourable member insists, I don't even know the meaning of the word, so I'll have to take it under advisement.

An hon. member: You old railroader.

Mr. S. Smith: Has that been in a Sun editorial? Maybe the member for Wilson Heights could advise whether that word was in a Sun editorial by any chance.

Mr. Foulds: Second question.

Mr. Hennessy: Just hurry it up; get it out.

ORAL QUESTIONS

FOOD INDUSTRY INQUIRY

Mr. S. Smith: I would like to ask a question of the Premier. Given the fact that this session appears to be grinding towards a close, does the Premier indicate what response his government might have to the requests made by the Ontario Federation of Agriculture for a public inquiry into certain food trade practices, given the very strong report from the committee and the report from the counsel of the committee? I realize that that report will be tabled later, but we are a little short of days in this session. I think the public, the Ontario Federation of Agriculture and the Consumers' Association of Canada are certainly waiting for some indication from the Premier as to what his course of action is going to be.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I have just within the last hour seen the press release from the Ontario Federation of Agriculture. I've had a telephone call from the president of the federation. I have not yet seen the final report of the committee, although I'm aware of some of its contents.

The only observation I would make is that the government has made it very clear that we are anxious to see any information of the kind that has been referred to. Yet I gather from the committee hearings that there is not too much evidence of substance, though I'm only making this assumption from a bystander's standpoint.

I would make this observation, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure the Leader of the Opposition has read it and will be governed by it too in his own approach: the federation made it very clear that they were in support of an independent inquiry under the Public Inquiries Act. In my assessment if there is to be such an inquiry I am impressed by the term "independent." In the establishment of any inquiry—if that decision were to be made and it will not be made today—I want to inform the Leader of the Opposition, and I think he would agree with me, that that suggestion from the Ontario Federation of Agriculture obviously is not on all fours with the final recommendation of the report that is coming to the committee.

As I recall—

Mr. MacDonald: They say it is.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, with great respect, it isn't then from my standpoint. I would only say to the Leader of the Opposition and the member for York South, who surely must have some sense of what is right and what is proper, that if we are in fact to have a royal commission—and that's really what it amounts to—with all of the problems implicit in that, including what will be a significant cost, if it is in fact—

Mr. Makarchuk: You don't have to hire Judy again.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, I would say to the member for Brantford that he and his colleagues should be the last ones to talk about who is hired, doing what and who is spending public money. I don't think those people opposite are in any position to know.

Mr. Makarchuk: I'm prepared to discuss the spending in our office compared to yours.

Hon. Mr. Davis: You guys love to throw stones.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Davis: You love to be critical and you can't take a little bit of fun. You can't take a little bit of fun.

Mr. Martel: How much do you cover up in yours?

An hon. member: It doesn't cost much to sit and sleep.

An hon. member: Don't be so sensitive.

Mr. Breaugh: Do you want to trade limousines, Bill?

Hon. Mr. Davis: All right. All right. I was answering the question, Mr. Speaker, and I confess, Mr. Speaker, to the members of the House that I am at some slight disadvantage in that I haven't read the report, but I am interested in the concept.

Mr. McClellan: Ignorance has never held you back before.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, I would say to the very distinguished member who quite obviously in the last five minutes has had his conscience pricked a little bit, I accept his observation.

Mr. McClellan: Not at all, not at all.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I understand it.

An hon. member: Conscience, if any.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, if the decision is made, if it is the wisdom of the House and the government that I cannot quite rationalize independence with having a member of the Liberal party—

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, listen, all right, so a nominee—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The members opposite will have difficulty in persuading me that there be "a nominee of the Liberal Party," "a nominee of the Progressive Conservative Party," "a nominee of the New Democratic Party," et cetera. If there is to be an inquiry, it has to be done objectively. I am one of those who will on occasion opt for a member of the judiciary because that takes it above any question as to whether people have an interest in this form of inquiry. If you are going to have a public inquiry, that's the way it should be, so that is my response to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Breagh: Get somebody like Doug Wiseman. He's not busy.

An hon. member: Thump for Hennessy.

Mr. S. Smith: By way of supplementary: Although I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I personally share the view of independence that the OFA has suggested rather than the Premier's idea, I don't particularly think it has to be a member of the judiciary. In fact, it might be of interest to the Premier that the Liberal nominee would be the very person suggested by the Minister of Agriculture and Food (Mr. W. Newman)—that is Mr. Poole, the counsel of the committee—

Mr. Roy: You guys should talk to Frank Drea. He doesn't think much of judges.

Mr. S. Smith:—so there's nothing political about that. But given that the Premier—

An hon. member: Poole is a good Liberal.

Mr. S. Smith: I know it is getting close to the end, but for heaven's sake!

An hon. member: Where's your critic?

Mr. S. Smith: Given that the Premier wishes to examine the report—

An hon. member: Welcome back, Mickey.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The honourable minister—the Leader of the Opposition will please continue.

Interjections.

Mr. Nixon: You're going to forget prayers next.

An hon. member: We don't know what he is, either.

Mr. S. Smith: We're not in the government ministry yet, Mr. Speaker. It will take a little while.

An hon. member: Not much longer, not much longer.

Mr. S. Smith: Given that the Premier deserves the opportunity to read the report, and we appreciate he may have some alternative to present for consideration, would he simply assure the House that we will have some clear response on this matter by tomorrow, since the intention at the moment is for us to recess tomorrow? If he needs a little more time, I am sure we can arrange to sit a little longer. But we and the OFA and the consumers want to have a response; we want to know when we are going to hear from the Premier.

Mr. Germa: What's your question?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I recognize the importance of this particular matter. I am not in a position to give the Leader of the Opposition a commitment that by 10 o'clock tomorrow morning the government will have made a determination. I say with respect I think that is not only somewhat unreasonable, it is less than logical—and I might be so bold as to say it is not totally intelligent.

Mr. Kerrio: Darcy does it; Darcy does it every day.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would suggest that in a matter of this importance, the question of whether there should be an inquiry is a decision that ultimately must be made by the cabinet, because the government ultimately must assume the responsibility.

Secondly, if the decision is in the affirmative, just what direction the particular inquiry should take involves a certain amount of discussion with the law officers of the crown to see that the terms of reference are framed in a manner that is appropriate.

Thirdly, it does involve consideration of who should be appointed. I have only made a passing reference to it because I feel very strongly—not that I am debating at this moment that particular part of the committee's recommendation—that I am not committed necessarily to a member of the judiciary but I think it would be less than independent and less than objective if we got down to the principle of having nominees from partisan groups in this province, and that includes my own.

I don't see it in the context. If the Leader of the Opposition had wanted, as has been his custom on some issues, to opt for a select committee, I would understand it as a part of the process. If members had wanted to have it as a matter for a standing committee, this I would understand. But I think, with respect, and I say this to the member for York South who has had years of experience, that it isn't totally logical to say that they want an objective, independent assessment of a matter as complex as this, and include in a recommendation that there will be nominees from this organization, that organization, including three political parties.

Mr. MacDonald: Why not?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I have just got to tell the member opposite there are some people in this province who will say, "That is not an objective way to make an assessment."

Mr. McClellan: Better than one party.

Mr. MacDonald: Since the Premier has indicated that there wasn't much substance to back up the allegations considered by the committee, is he aware that the report presented to the committee by our counsel, and adopted by the committee, indicates that on the basis of the public testimony, backed up further by the private testimony he got in camera, there is a prima facie case for the existence of these practices, and therefore there is need for a further inquiry?

Secondly, is the Premier aware of the fact that the counsel advised the committee that a judicial inquiry, headed by a judge, was not the best route and that the committee agreed with that?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I happen to know counsel and have for some time. I certainly respect his point of view on some issues. I think for counsel to suggest to the committee that a judge is not necessarily the most appropriate person—I am not committed to the inquiry at this point, because I haven't had an opportunity to deal with it. Secondly, I am not necessarily committed to a judge. But I can tell the honourable member that I am not committed either to the concept as contained in what I understand is to be the committee's report.

I haven't discussed with Mr. Poole if he is going to be the member's source for what he feels should be done, his rationale, because I am not sure that he suggested that it be on the basis of nominations from political parties in this province. In fact my guess is that he didn't, my guess is that if the member for York West is endeavouring—

Mr. MacDonald: South, you mean?

Hon. Mr. Davis: —the member for York South is endeavouring to use Mr. Poole as the rationale for what went on, then maybe the committee should have accepted his recommendation as to how the inquiry should be conducted.

Mr. MacDonald: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I said to the Premier that the advice of the counsel was that there was need for further inquiry, and it was on that basis we accepted the evidence. Now don't distort that to something else.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, no; I don't want to get into a debate, but the member for York South made two points. Firstly, he referred to the makeup of the committee, he did that in what he said.

Secondly, he made the point that Mr. Poole had recommended in his report to the committee that in his view—I am delighted to see the member for York South always takes the view of those experts and counsel; he didn't do it on another committee that I can recall, but today he is prepared to accept—not making his own judgement—prepared to accept Mr. Poole's advice. I have every respect for Mr. Poole, I know him better than the member does, I guess.

Mr. McClellan: You seem to be on the hook today.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would only say that from my observation, and it is only as an observer in reading the press, I didn't see, and I was looking for, specific issues or items where in fact something illegal or inappropriate had gone on. That is the only point I was making.

Mr. MacDonald: I do.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The honourable member can correct me. Maybe he knows of specifics or situations where in fact something illegal or immoral or improper went on that was provable, and if that is the case I think he should let me know. I am interested in seeing that the right thing is done.

Mr. MacDonald: I let the counsel know I let the committee know.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am interested in seeing that the right thing is done. I know that politics enters into this, I am not unaware of that; I am not unaware of some of the differences of opinion in the loyal opposition across the House as to how this should proceed.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Is the member's question on the same item?

Mr. S. Smith: It seems futile, but I was intending to have one more.

Mr. Eaton: He never got a chance in committee.

Mr. Conway: There's chain store Eaton.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must remind all honourable members we have spent 14 minutes and we are on the first question.

Mr. S. Smith: I took about one of those minutes, Mr. Speaker.

I will ask the Premier once again: given the fact that the committee is clear in its desire for a public inquiry with the powers under the Public Inquiries Act; given the fact that the OFA and consumers are also in favour and that the counsel found evidence that requires such a finding and such an inquiry, and said so in the strongest possible terms; why, accepting that the Premier may need some time to draft a frame of reference and get legal advice and so on, why can the Premier not give us some assurance today or tomorrow that there will in fact be such a public inquiry, whether the form takes the sort recommended by the committee or with slight differences that the Premier may for some reason imagine are necessary?

Hon. Mr. Davis: If the honourable member thinks the distinction I am drawing from what I understand is in the committee report is slight, I will leave that up to his interpretation.

As one who has to assume responsibility for these things, I would say, with respect, the distinction I am drawing is not slight. You can disagree with it, but it is fairly fundamental, and if the Leader of the Opposition doesn't recognize some fundamental principles then that is his responsibility.

Mr. Roy: Just answer the question.

Mr. S. Smith: Why can't the Premier assure us we are going to have it?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would say to the Leader of the Opposition, I know that he wants an instant answer from me. I know that he thinks he has the intellectual capacity to have an instant answer for everything that comes across his plate.

I can only say to the Leader of the Opposition, and I make this confession to him, I don't pretend to have the same intellectual capacity that he pretends to have and I am not in a position to say by 10 o'clock tomorrow morning that thus, thus and thus is going to happen.

Mr. Peterson: That is the first time you have been right.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I confess to this human frailty. I need some time to see that whatever decision is made it is made properly and intelligently. To that human frailty, I confess. The Leader of the Opposition will not have, by 10 o'clock tomorrow morning, I am sorry, a definite answer.

[2:45]

Mr. Cassidy: Final supplementary, Mr. Speaker: The Premier has indicated we will not have an answer to that tomorrow. Can the Premier guarantee to the House that it will be an independent inquiry in the form recommended by the committee; or putting it the other way, can he explain to the House how it can be that a committee entirely appointed by the government party could be more independent than a committee in the form recommended by the standing committee?

Hon. Mr. Davis: This is a form of investigation. It is not, with great respect, comparable to the royal commission on violence and some other broad subject areas. My recollection—and members opposite can correct me if I'm wrong—is that most royal commissions that are investigative in nature, where there are suggestions of something improper, illegal or what have you, have been conducted, by and large, by members of the bench. If the leader of the New Democratic Party wants to cast some aspersions on those people who have served on those royal commissions, be my guest.

I do draw a distinction. I will only repeat to him what I said to the Leader of the Opposition. I have made no decision; I don't even have the report of the committee in terms of the House, I will have no determination by 10 o'clock tomorrow.

If the decision is to have a commission, my answer to him is very simple: yes, if it is held it will be independent.

Mr. Martel: You know about political appointments.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Of course I do.

NUCLEAR PLANT SAFETY

Mr. S. Smith: I'd like to direct my second question to the Minister of Energy. Given the fact that the minister, just as other people, including myself, has the task from time to time of trying to persuade people that we need a nuclear option as part of our future in this province, given the difficulty which, I'm sure he encounters sometimes, as I myself do, in explaining this to people, is he not as dismayed as I am that our task is rendered more difficult by an appearance that there are people being less than frank with the public and giving the impression that there's somehow something to hide with regard to nuclear safety? Does he not realize, as I do—and I imagine he must—that this only makes the job of reasonable, non-hysterical discussion more difficult?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Who are you talking about? The member for Grey-Bruce? It sounds like a perfect description of him.

Mr. Sargent: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, make him qualify that remark.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Not only will he qualify it; he will quantify it.

Mr. S. Smith: One word about hysteria and the Treasurer comes to life. It's amazing.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: We don't have to have a word about it. We just look at you. You're the last one who should talk.

Mr. S. Smith: Given the fact that I assume the minister agrees with me about that general problem that one faces of openness with the public, can the minister tell us whether the power production of the Douglas reactor was derated to 70 per cent in April, 1977; and was it because of concern over the effectiveness of the emergency cooling system, should that system ever have to come into use? If so, can he say who made that decision and why it was not made public?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: First of all, I would like to say I fully agree with the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Peterson: You're getting smart now.

Mrs. Campbell: The Treasurer spoke too soon.

Hon. Mr. Baetz:—that it is most unfortunate in a matter of such primary public importance and concern on a subject which is, as we all appreciate, a scientific one—a complex and a difficult one for many of us in the House and the man on the street to understand—that the debate is going forward in a manner which I think is most unfortunate.

The most recent illustration of the way this public debate is going forward is the front-page headline of today's Toronto Star which says: "Public Never Told: Safety 'Insufficient' at Nuclear Plants." That is wrong.

Ms. Gigantes: Oh, come on.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: That is the fact.

Mrs. Campbell: See, Darcy, you spoke too soon.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: It is most unfortunate that that kind of headline appears in one of our outstanding Canadian newspapers.

Mr. Laughren: That is right.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Prove it.

Mr. Sargent: You are totally wrong.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: I have today discussed that report at considerable length with Dr. Prince of the Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada. I have discussed it at length with the chairman of the Ontario Hydro board and with his scientists.

Mr. Laughren: Yes, all the vested interests.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: All of them agree that the headline—sort of the bottom line of the whole thing which says really that the safety is insufficient and there is a coverup job here—all of them agree they will say categorically, and are going to do so officially tomorrow, that that is incorrect.

Mr. Warner: We want proof.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: On the question of the Douglas Point reactor—

Mr. McClellan: You are unglued on every seam.

Mr. Germa: You are going to melt us all.

Hon. Mr. Baetz:—it is true that the output of that particular reactor was reduced some time ago. I was never officially informed of it. It was not even felt to be sufficiently important to inform me because it was simply a precautionary step for the Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada to take. I find that even reassuring and encouraging, that they would take every precaution down the road to make sure that these reactors are operating well within the safety standards.

Mr. M. Davidson: Without notifying you.

Mr. Mackenzie: I would take it the other way if I were you.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: That is my answer.

Mr. S. Smith: Supplementary: May I, again without in any way wishing to create an impression there is something wrong—because I don't know if there is and I hope there isn't—but may I ask, and this is a very serious matter, does the minister mean to say that a 70 per cent rating was imposed on that reactor as a precautionary step, as he puts it—one is glad of that, of course—that was obviously known to Hydro, it's their reactor, so one presumes it was known, and yet neither he nor his predecessor who was minister at the time was informed about this? If that is what he's saying, may I ask him to give me his opinion as to whether the decision, whether or not this was to be made public, should have rested with Hydro or with the government?

Would he accept my view that the government should have been informed so it could make the decision as to what is to be public and what is to be private?

Ms. Gigantes: You were informed two years ago.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: I would not, frankly, accept the view that the government should decide at what level the nuclear reactor should operate.

Ms. Gigantes: That wasn't the question.

Mr. Kerrio: That was not the question.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: That is the responsibility of Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada, and AECB is responsible to the federal government; it determines the safety requirements of these reactors.

Mr. S. Smith: A point of privilege: In the event that the microphones were not working correctly, the point I was asking the minister to address himself to was not whether the government should make the decision about the cutback, but whether the decision as to whether or not that cutback should be made known to the public was something the government should have been making; or whether the government should have been kept in ignorance, as it apparently was by Hydro which reserved the right to make that decision about the publicity or lack of it to itself.

Ms. Gigantes: They kept themselves in ignorance.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: On the question—and this relates to the basic question of safety—I have said before and will say again, certainly we here in the government in the province of Ontario, as the government at the federal level and as the general public, should be kept fully informed of all decisions made here.

Mr. Deans: Why are we not?

Mr. M. Davidson: We weren't.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: But I would also like to say that unfortunately—and again relating back to the newspaper articles—I think there has been far too much made of the thought that the reactor cannot work at a certain level, say 100 per cent level, and has to be kept back to another level because it would otherwise be unsafe.

Mr. Deans: You are better off with short answers.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: For example, we have frequently been told that the reactor at Bruce is only operating at 88 per cent capacity because, it is always implied, it would be unsafe for it to act at 100 per cent. In fact, that reactor was built to operate at an 88 per cent capacity. At 88 per cent capacity of that reactor the turbines are turning out 100 per cent of the electrical energy potential.

Mr. Sargent: Now it's 65 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: It was designed to operate at 88 per cent and yet we keep hearing and reading that because it's not operating at 100 per cent it is therefore unsafe.

Mr. Swart: Eighty-eight is 100 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: It is licensed to operate at 88 per cent. That turns out 100 per cent of electricity. I don't know how else to make it more clear.

Mr. Sargent: You can't. You don't know. What school did you go to?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Eddie, I know.

Mr. S. Smith: The minister can address himself to the question.

Ms. Gigantes: I wonder whether the minister asked Dr. Prince why there was a recommendation, made in 1976, to keep Bruce at a 65 per cent rating factor? Did he also ask him what's changed since and why is Bruce operating at a much higher level now?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: When any reactor goes into service, it goes into service gradually. It starts at five per cent, it goes to 10, it goes to 50, it goes to 60.

Ms. Gigantes: That wasn't a good answer a few years ago.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: They are constantly measuring its output and also determining its safety features.

Ms. Gigantes: Has the minister seen those reports?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: These reactors and the limits at which they are licensed to operate at the present time are safe. That's the bottom line of this whole argument as far as I'm concerned.

Ms. Gigantes: If the minister says so.

Mr. Bolan: Come on, Eddie!

Mr. S. Smith: By way of supplementary, would the minister please try to address himself to what I think is a very key question? A rating of 70 per cent was put on the Douglas Point reactor because of this concern about melt problems in the unlikely event that everything else fails, all right. The decision was made by Hydro not to tell the government, and therefore the decision of whether to tell the public was ipso facto left in Hydro's hands, the government not knowing about it.

What I want to find out from the minister is: has he found some justification from Hydro? Has he demanded a justification from Hydro for them keeping the government in ignorance about that derating? Has he demanded not only an explanation, but a very full explanation indeed, of why such a shocking refusal to inform the government has occurred? Does he not feel that this is something that only undermines public confidence?

Ms. Gigantes: Malcolm Rowan knew about it.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: It isn't a shocking refusal to report something very important to the government. It's a case of Ontario Hydro—this was a normal step which was taken. The property incidentally, belongs to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, operated by Ontario Hydro. AECB sets the standards. It was cut back to 70 per cent of operation. It was assumed that this was a normal decision. They feel that this was not the kind of reporting, the type of thing that required something to go forward to government. I am sure if suddenly there were to be a serious flaw discovered in the reactor, or in the turbines or anything else that would affect the public safety, Ontario Hydro would inform us very quickly.

I would certainly take it upon myself to be kept informed of that. They know my stance on that. I am convinced at this point that Ontario Hydro is openly reporting what is required and what the public has to know.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask about the Bruce plant, because the Bruce plant is the one that is operated by Ontario Hydro. The minister has now said publicly in the House that there is a distinction between the capacity to which the reactors were operating and the capacity to which electrical energy is being produced. Would he also care to comment on the differences between Ontario Hydro and the Atomic Energy Control Board over whether the remaining 12 per cent of capacity can be safely used at the Bruce to generate steam or generate electrical energy? Are those differences not over safety and the question of the emergency core cooling system?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: No. At the present time, Atomic Energy of Canada and Ontario Hydro are looking into and examining the question of whether the capacity of that reactor can be increased by 12 per cent, and whether steam in fact can be produced when the heavy water plant comes on stream about two years from now.

[3:00]

I am confident that if it is determined that that reactor can, in fact, operate at an additional 12 per cent of power, they will license it to operate at 100 per cent. If they don't, the honourable members can be dead sure it will never be licensed to operate at anything beyond a safe level.

Ms. Gigantes: Dead is what we may be.

Mr. Warner: It's a good choice of words.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that not a single insurance company in North America will give one cent of life or property insurance against radiation; in view of the fact that Dr. Edward Teller said that all we can do is guess and hope we are right; and in view of the fact that we have a situation at Bruce whereby we have a 65 per cent operating capacity—we are 35 per cent wrong in a $1 billion operation—and the minister tells us these stories in the paper are false—will he tell me, if the leakage had not been reported in the press, would he have reported it to the Legislature?

Mrs. Campbell: He wouldn't have known.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: To respond to the first part of that question first, I am not sure whether insurance companies won't insure against radiation hazards; maybe they won't.

Mr. Sargent: You should know that.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: I would only say that on the basis of the safety record at our nuclear reactors in this province the insurance companies are foolish not to do so, because there has been not one radiation accident in this province. There is no industry can demonstrate a safety record comparable to that.

Ms. Gigantes: That is simply not true.

Mr. Warner: What are you afraid of?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: When the member says that Bruce is kind of operating inefficiently—I think the figure used was 35 per cent less than capacity—he is again incorrect. The Bruce reactor was designed to operate at 88 per cent, which provides 100 per cent electrical generating capacity, and that is what it is doing. These plants are operating safely and efficiently.

Mr. Warner: You wouldn't answer the question. Would you have reported it? No.

Mr. Speaker: Final supplementary; the member for Port Arthur.

Mr. Foulds: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker: Could the minister forget his usual bluster and tell this House exactly what instruction he has given Ontario Hydro about when they should bother him? Can he tell us whether he sleeps in his bed a little more soundly tonight because Ontario Hydro is in charge, or has he given Ontario Hydro strict instructions to inform his deputy, and his deputy to inform him, every time there is any kind of a variation or shutdown in one of our nuclear plants? Does he not think the public would be reassured more readily if that information came to us the moment the minister knew and if things like the Bruce 40 Notes and the Loss of Coolant Accident Report were made public when they came to the ministry's attention?

Hon. Mr. Baetz: Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure this House that I have instructed the chairman of Ontario Hydro to provide me with all information that is appropriate for this House and for the general public.

Mr. Foulds: Who makes that judgement? Hydro or you?

Mrs. Campbell: Who makes that judgement?

Mr. Warner: Hydro does. They run their own show. They do what they please.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: In all of this we have to remember that we do have a chairman of Ontario Hydro, a responsible citizen; we do have a board of directors of Ontario Hydro and we do have a staff—

Mr. Foulds: We thought we had a responsible minister.

Hon. Mr. Baetz: We in this House are not the board of directors of Ontario Hydro—

Mr. Bolan: And you shouldn't be the minister

Hon. Mr. Baetz: —but I can assure the member opposite that Ontario Hydro has got the message clear: I want to be kept informed and I will keep this House and the general public informed.

Mr. Cassidy: You should have begun the day you became minister.

EMPLOYEES' HEALTH AND SAFETY

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Labour, arising out of the uncertainty about the fate of Bill 70, the omnibus health and safety bill which was tabled in this House to come back for third reading in February. Could the minister end the uncertainty and give the House a straightforward assurance that the bill will be returned to the House as soon as we resume our session in early October?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Speaker, I would be unable to pinpoint the date that accurately because the consultation process which I had hoped would be completed by the end of June has not been completed.

Mr. T. P. Reid: This is the biggest stall you have ever pulled—along with the workmen's compensation stall.

Hon. B. Stephenson: We have not been able to arrange meetings with the association of fire chiefs, nor with some of the associations representing municipalities which have expressed some concern. We have met with most of the employee groups at this time. As soon as that is completed and we have some knowledge of the appropriate routes to follow in order to solve the health and safety problems of those workers whose coverage would be included in the bill as a result of the amendments, then I shall be able to report to the House precisely when we are going to be working on it.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker: Since there have been 32 of those meetings, and there are apparently nine to go according to the reply that the minister has tabled in the House; and since the summer is clearly an adequate time in order to have those remaining consultations; can we have a commitment from the minister that she will do everything possible to finish the consultations in the early part of the summer? And can we have a commitment from her that at the earliest possible date when the session resumes in the fall the bill will be called back and will be presented to the House for its approval?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: How does that grab you, Mike?

Mr. Speaker: Second question.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Kerrio: Next.

Mr. Deans: That wasn't very kind.

Mr. Cassidy: Can I now ask the minister to define more closely "the earliest possible moment"? We would like the assurance that the bill will be back in the House in the fall and will not be allowed to die.

An hon. member: Will we see it in October?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I said that it would be at the earliest possible moment—that is when it will be.

Mr. Laughren: You told us that before.

Mr. Nixon: 1984.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I cannot at this point tell members what the earliest possible moment is going to be, but it will be then.

Mr. S. Smith: Just after the budget is balanced.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker: Can we have an assurance from the minister that under no circumstance will she or the government allow Bill 70 to die?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I have stated on many occasions that the occupational health and safety legislation is extremely important. In addition to the demands which the honourable member is imposing upon my ministry this summer, we are also carrying out the process of consultation in order to establish regulations for toxic substances.

Mr. Lupusella: Answer the question.

Hon. B. Stephenson: This is going to be done as vigorously as we can.

Mr. Sargent: You are a good stick-handler.

Hon. B. Stephenson: This is a very important subject. It is one which must be kept growing rather than letting it die.

Mr. Sargent: Put her on the hockey team.

COMMITTAL OF DOCTOR

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Health, arising out of some problems we have had in my riding over the course of the weekend.

Hon. Mr. Bernier: Parochial.

Mr. G. Taylor: Toronto or Ottawa?

Mr. T. P. Reid: Toronto and the Islands?

Mr. Cassidy: Is the minister aware that on Saturday last a Dr. Fred Stenger went to the Ottawa Civic Hospital complaining of dizziness which he thought was caused by high blood pressure? Is he aware that having been seen by a psychiatrist he was then kept in the hospital for two days; that he was told on certain instances that he could not leave the hospital, that mention was made of the Mental Health Act, that he was kept in the psychiatric ward, that on his request to leave he was told that the staff would have to talk to the senior advisers; then when he finally did leave, he left only after signing a waiver relieving the hospital of any responsibility because he was leaving against medical advice; and that three days after this all began he was telephoned by the doctor who said that the commitment was a mistake in judgement?

Is the minister aware of this curious set of events, and will the minister make a report to the House?

Mr. Havrot: His doctor must have been the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, the patient was the leader of the third party.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: No, Mr. Speaker, I had not heard of that incident. I certainly will ask my staff to report. I would anticipate that given the length and nature of the question it will take more than about 18 hours to prepare the answer, so I would anticipate what I will do is write to the honourable member when I have a full and complete description of the incident and whatever explanation there is for it.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Send it in care of the Ottawa psychiatric ward.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: I will send that to him as soon as it is ready.

Mr. Warner: But you won't do anything.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker: In view of the concerns that have been raised in this House about the use of the powers of involuntary commitment under the Mental Health Act, could the minister focus on that particular aspect of this case, where a patient who went in complaining of dizziness found himself apparently kept in hospital against his will for a period of two and a half days? Can he make a report on that particular aspect, about the possible use of involuntary commitment powers, and report that part to the House before we rise tomorrow?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Again, it sounds like a rather involved and perhaps delicate question to which I would prefer to give the member a complete answer in writing once I have had it investigated.

Mr. Nixon: You didn't set it up by any chance?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: As members know, the question of involuntary commitment is embodied in Bill 19, which will be considered here in committee of the whole House, probably tomorrow morning. I think it is a matter about which we are all concerned. I will have the entire matter investigated. Rather than trying to deal with it piecemeal, I would prefer, if the member doesn't mind, to give him a complete answer.

Mr. Roy: Supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: It has been taken as notice.

SPADINA EXPRESSWAY

Mrs. Campbell: My question, Mr. Speaker, is to the Premier.

Mr. Kerrio: Right to the top.

Mrs. Campbell: Whereas almost three years have passed since the Premier made certain commitments to reassure the opponents of the Spadina Expressway that the decision to end the roadway at Eglinton Avenue was final and irreversible, and considering that not one of the three commitments made in August 1975 has been fulfilled, could the Premier now advise us on the progress of negotiations for the title of all properties, road allowances, rights of way and other lands originally scheduled for the route of the Spadina Expressway south of Eglinton Avenue West? And could he advise us how quickly such negotiations and the assumption of title will likely be concluded to the three-foot strip south of Eglinton Avenue which is to be bequeathed to the city of Toronto as an insurance against the extension of the Spadina Expressway south of Eglinton Avenue?

Will the Premier today reaffirm all of his commitments of August 1975, indicating there will be no extension of that expressway south of Eglinton Avenue West, and will he urge Metropolitan Toronto to conclude its report with reference to the park-and-ride facility not later than September of this year?

Mr. Kerrio: Yes.

Mr. Bradley: Answer yes or no.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I had difficulty following all of the question. Would it be too much of a problem for the honourable member to repeat it so I make sure I get it right?

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Davis: She'd be delighted to.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. S. Smith: We don't expect the Premier to remember his promises, of course.

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Speaker, I have one supplementary which I think the Premier can address himself to. Recognizing that he does not always remember his commitments—

Interjections.

Mr. Nixon: Those are exactly what she's listed.

Mr. Warner: Remember the Bramalea charter.

Mr. Martel: Transportation man of the year.

Mrs. Campbell: Would the Premier at least assure the House today that his commitment stands and that the Spadina Expressway will not be extended below Eglinton Avenue? Perhaps he could repeat that commitment at least this afternoon.

Mr. Germa: Yes or no?

Mr. McClellan: Answer yes or no.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I really can't say yes or no as simply as that.

Mr. Roy: It's not election time.

Mr. S. Smith: You did in 1975.

Mr. Roy: And 1971.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Pardon?

Mr. S. Smith: You had no trouble in 1975 making that commitment.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Ever since a few days ago, the Leader of the Opposition—

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Just ignore the interjections.

Hon. Mr. Davis: He's getting just a little irritable, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deans: He is getting irritable; you are getting irritating.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Irritating.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, no; irritable. Irritating I have known about for quite a while; irritable is more recent.

Mr. Breithaupt: Wait until we come back after the summer.

Hon. Mr. Davis: After the summer? Oh, no.

I'm trying to refresh my memory so I don't unintentionally mislead the House.

Mr. S. Smith: Do it intentionally.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I leave that up to the Leader of the Opposition, he can make his own judgements.

Mr. Mancini: You leave a lot of things up to the Leader of the Opposition.

[3:15]

Hon. Mr. Davis: There were three issues the honourable member raised. My recollection is that they were the three-foot reserve, also the parking facilities, also the right of way south of Eglinton.

Historically, there are two or three problems involved and I will confess some lack of knowledge in this. Going back a few years, there was an assumption—perhaps an erroneous assumption made by others and not just myself—that the property to the south of Eglinton Avenue in the Spadina corridor was actually within the city of Toronto. I think this was an assumption made by some officials of the city of Toronto and several others.

The government has been working diligently in order to fulfil that commitment, but it is very difficult to deed to the city of Toronto a three-foot reserve which is, in fact, in York. So we are trying to sort that out. It has been complicated, somewhat, because at one point in time the council of the borough of York, I think was in agreement, basically, with the policy of the government. I sense that there is not quite the same agreement as between the borough of York and the city of Toronto and the government with respect to the future of that particular corridor. So it has been difficult to negotiate any, shall we say, accommodation by York vis-à-vis the city of Toronto for the three-foot reserve.

As recently as June 12, a letter was sent from the ministry, I think to Mayor Crombie, offering a three-foot reserve which is just east of the Bathurst Street bridge. Geographically I can't say to the honourable member whether that is, in itself, sufficient.

Mr. McClellan: It's not.

Hon. Mr. Davis: To date we haven't had a reply from Mayor Crombie, although there was such a suggestion made, I think on April 24. I'm quite optimistic that we'll get that sorted out in some form or other.

I apologize for taking so long, Mr. Speaker, but you must admit, and I'm sure agree with me, that it was a fairly lengthy question and is deserving of a detailed answer.

There is the question of the transfer of the land. The honourable member is aware that it is always important that there be a search of title and that we, in the public interest, acquaint ourselves with all of these matters.

So that particular aspect has been going forward.

The title to the property that has been now very clearly established by the province, I am told there has to be a certain amount of survey work and I would say to the Leader of the Opposition that survey work takes more than a few weeks.

Mr. S. Smith: Three years.

Hon. Mr. Davis: It is a fairly detailed survey that is required. This is almost finished and will be completed within the next few weeks.

The commitment has been received by us from Metro—and this is a two-way street if I can use that terminology—that the Metro officials will have this agreement to present to the Metro council by mid-September.

Mr. Roy: Too bad the Premier is not in the development business.

Hon. Mr. Davis: So there is a three-foot reserve. Where we're having the difficulty is as to where we locate that reserve, the lands we think we will have surveyed and laid out ready for agreement by the Metro Council by mid-September.

Regarding the Spadina parking facility, Mr. Speaker, I confess there is not the same clear solution to the problem. We have made an offer for the construction at the Glencairn location for payment of some 75 per cent of the cost—the minister can correct me if I'm wrong.

Our problem with this particular situation is that, once again, we have a divided jurisdiction. We have no unanimity as between Metro council and the city of Toronto. We have met our commitment in terms of saying that we will pay the funding, there is no question about that.

Really, I guess I could have summed it up in the first place by saying that the policy of the government hasn't changed. We are not seeking, nor will we in any way allow an extension of the—Allen Expressway I think is the correct terminology, and the honourable member would want me to use the correct terminology—south of Eglinton Avenue. While I've read a great deal about it in the press—the odd editorial—I can assure the honourable member the policy is not changed and we are moving as rapidly as we can from our end on those three issues, two of which I think will be fairly easily resolved, although the three-foot reserve is a bit difficult. The parking situation I can't guarantee will be as simply resolved, but we have made our position known and I think the honourable member can be relatively comfortable that she won't see the Allen Expressway going south of Eglinton.

I'm sorry that it was such a short answer.

Mr. Warner: A supplementary: I wonder if the Premier could perhaps agree with us on the opposition side that we're a bit sceptical about his explanation today. When the statement was first made in August, 1975, nearly three years ago, the statement was quite clear, quite explicit, that the province will grant to the city a three-foot reserve across the road of the former expressway, that it will bring a resolve to the problem so we won't see a continuation of the Spadina Expressway. Yet three years later all we hear is that there is some difficulty about the legal status of the three-foot right of way.

Doesn't this appear to tarnish, somewhat, the award which the Premier won earlier as the transit man of the year? In fact, we are no further ahead today than we were three years ago. Unless we continue to push on this issue, there will be an extension of that Spadina Expressway. Surely we need better action than what we have today?

Mr. Speaker: The question has been asked.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I understand the member for Scarborough-Ellesmere is involving himself in a bit of a political statement other than a question.

Mr. Martel: You would never do that though.

Mr. Breaugh: Unlike the Premier.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Unlike the Premier, yes. I think the proof of the matter, Mr. Speaker, is that in spite of the support of a number of people, who will remain nameless, through whom a great deal of pressure was exerted on myself personally and members of the government, the Allen Expressway has not proceeded south of Eglinton Avenue.

I think it must be obvious even to the member for Scarborough-Ellesmere that while people can speculate about it, while they can say we haven't got that three-foot reserve, that while the land hasn't yet been deeded to the province of Ontario from Metropolitan Toronto, the reality of life and the legal nature of the situation precludes the Allen Expressway being extended. While we certainly are going to meet those commitments, if the member studied the issue just a shade more he would understand that the possibility of the Allen Expressway extending south is really nil. It would require the government of this province to alter its position, and it has no intention of doing so.

Mr. Breithaupt: Which it is.

Mr. Nixon: Again.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Members opposite should not talk about altering positions, they really shouldn't. Somebody had a phrase for members opposite the other day.

Mr. Nixon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, just so the Premier can be prevented from misleading the House, the position of the Liberal Party at the time when he and his ministers had a signed commitment with the city of Toronto to build the Spadina Expressway right down to the waterfront, was that it should continue no further than Eglinton and that it should have a parking garage associated with it. That's been our position.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, in the last two or three days—

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Davis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker: The former member for Downsview Mr. Singer, was never in support of that position. Members opposite know it and I know it. The Liberals had six positions on Spadina within six months. They know it and I know it. Mr. Speaker, we are really getting in—I am sorry.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order. There's really nothing out of order, there's nothing out of order at all. A new question from the member for Hamilton East.

Mr. Nixon: The then Minister of Highways signed an agreement and the Premier repudiated it. Talk about division in cabinet.

An hon. member: Name the members.

Mr. Nixon: I don't want the Premier to mislead anybody, least of all himself.

Mr. Conway: Which isn't very difficult.

MEAT PACKING DISPUTE

Mr. Mackenzie: A question of the Solicitor General: I assume the Solicitor General is aware that some 2,600 packinghouse workers, members of the Canadian Food and Allied Workers, are being locked out of their work place in spite of their desire to go to work. Can the minister assure us that the police will be available in sufficient numbers to assist the workers to enter the plant to perform their jobs?

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: How did you ever get into the union?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: Mr. Speaker, the police will be there if necessary to maintain peace and order around the plant.

Mr. Deans: To open up the picket line.

Mr. Mackenzie: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker: Considering that the minister was willing to use large numbers of police to assist the company to allow access to Fleck Manufacturing Plant by some of the workers to perform their jobs, would the minister explain why he would not offer the same assistance to workers who wish to work at Canada Packers? In the event he doesn't, is the minister prepared to withdraw the police from Fleck Manufacturing?

Hon. Mr. Kerr: Mr. Speaker, apparently the hon. member predicted my answer to his original question and he had the supplementary written out.

Mr. Deans: Well the Solicitor General is predictable.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: The honourable member knows very well, because I have a great deal of respect for his knowledge of labour matters, that a lockout situation with the plants he refers to is quite different from the situation at Centralia.

HOSPITAL BOARD REPORTS

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: On June 19, the member for York Centre (Mr. Stong) asked my colleague, the Provincial Secretary for Social Development (Mrs. Birch) in my absence that steps be taken to set, make known and enforce guidelines which would require hospital boards to be more accountable to their members in communities in terms of supplying general statistics concerning the numbers of, types of and procedures used in operations performed at their respective hospitals.

Mr. Speaker: If there were fewer interjections, we would all be able to hear better.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: I would like to point out to the honourable member that our guidelines at the present time is that the ministry by means of its annual publication of hospital statistics releases annual data on number of diagnoses and procedures on a provincial basis only, for all of Ontario hospitals. It remains the decision of each hospital board to determine if any more detailed data will be released on specific procedures performed at the hospital.

OHIP BENEFITS SCHEDULE

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Secondly, on June 13 the member for Hamilton West (Mr. S. Smith) inquired about OHIP policy regarding the payment for experimental and as yet unproven forms of treatment.

In the past year, few services have been deleted from the OHIP schedule of benefits, but there have been several description modifications. However, the specific service that the honourable member asked about in the House has been neither deleted nor modified because it has never been a benefit. Moreover, to my knowledge, the Ontario Health Insurance Plan has never knowingly paid for any experimental procedures.

The act itself would exclude these services, both because of unproven medical necessity and because the Ontario Medical Association has never considered such procedures to be listed in its schedule of fees.

With regard to PUVA, the Ontario Medical Association was asked specifically about this treatment in August 1976. The OMA responded that this treatment was experimental and that no fee should be established; thus any claims for PUVA under code G467, which is for ultraviolet light treatment, have been inappropriate and incorrect. The wording in the interim schedule of benefits from OHIP under code G467, on page 100, simply reflects this opinion of the medical association. So OHIP's policy has not been changed but it is now stipulated in the schedule.

Further, in February 1978 the OMA again was asked about this treatment and an answer was received this week. The OMA is now of the opinion that treatment of psoriasis and other related conditions with "high intensity A-band ultra-violet light in conjunction with all medication" in other words PUVA, is still experimental and therefore inappropriate to claim.

Other dermatological ultraviolet light treatment may be appropriate and may be claimed under this code. Accordingly, the description in the schedule of benefits of ultraviolet light treatment will be altered to reflect this opinion.

The Ontario Medical Association has stressed that it expects the foregoing treatment to be approved by the Food and Drug Administration in the near future. At that time the OMA will consider again whether PUVA is any longer experimental and it will again be considered for inclusion under OHIP benefits.

Finally, should the honourable member wish a complete list of the deleted codes from the schedule of benefits, I will be more than happy to send it to him with a letter.

MINISTRY OF AGRICULTURE AND FOOD ANNUAL REPORT, 1976-77

Mr. Havrot from the standing resources development committee presented the committee's report on the Annual Report of the Ministry of Agriculture and Food for 1976-77 and moved its adoption.

Mr. Laughren: The anti-farmer member from Timiskaming.

Mr. Havrot: The anti-Cassidy member from Nickel Belt.

Mr. Speaker: The honourable member has placed the Chair in a very difficult position. You are moving the adoption of a report that is not in the record. It contains 17 pages. If the honourable member wants the House to consider it, we are going to have to read it into the record. I am not going to put a question about which the House knows nothing.

Clerk of the House: Your committee, having considered the reference from the Legislature of the Annual Report of the Ministry of Agriculture and Food for 1977, submits the following report for consideration and adoption by the assembly:

The committee thanks its counsel, Mr. William Poole, for his submission and accepts his recommendations with the following amendments:

A. That item 1 on page 16 of such report be deleted and the following substituted.

That an inquiry be conducted under the Public Inquiries Act into the marketing of food in Ontario with respect to prices, price spreads, price discounts, rebates and allowances, trade practices, methods of financing and management policies relating to the marketing of farm products. The terms "marketing" and "farm products" to have the meaning provided by sections 1(b) and 1(e) of the Farm Products Marketing Act.

B. That item 2 on page 16 of the said report be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

That such inquiry be conducted by a Food Industry Trade Practices Commission composed of (1) a nominee of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture; (2) a nominee of the Ontario section of the Consumer's Association of Canada; (3) a nominee of each of the Progressive Conservative, Liberal and New Democrat caucuses of the Legislature, and that the chairman of the commission be appointed from the above nominees by the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

(c) That the word "study" be substituted for the word "investigate" in item 4 on page 16 of the said submission.

Since May 24, 1978, I have attended all your sessions—

This is the report of Mr. Poole.

Mr. Nixon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, before the Clerk proceeds, I think you will find that the words the Clerk has already read, except for the recommendations in the report that is in his hands, and those recommendations that would be found on the last page—

Mr. S. Smith: Pages 15 or 16, as I recall.

Mr. Speaker: Is it acceptable to all members of the House to read only the recommendations appended to the report?

Agreed.

Clerk of the House: These are the recommendations:

First step:

1. The Milk Commission of Ontario should monitor the wholesale and retail prices of fluid milk in selected markets in Ontario on a regular basis, and not less than twice a year, to determine any significant changes in prices and margins and the existence or absence of effective competition in the market place.

2. The Milk Commission of Ontario should monitor on a continuing basis the types and amounts of discounts given by fluid milk processors and distributors to their various customers and assess the effect of this practice on the structure and competitiveness of the industry.

3. The Ontario Food Council should monitor the wholesale and retail prices of other foods in Ontario on a regular basis to determine any significant changes in prices and margins and the existence or absence of effective competition in the market place.

4. The Ontario Food Council should monitor on a continuing basis the types and amounts of discounts given by processors to retailers and assess the effect of this practice on the structure and competitiveness of the industry.

It is noted, for example, that Mrs. Shand, who appeared before us, is a member of the food council.

5. The milk commission and the food council should discuss any evidence of excessive margins, discount or discriminatory trade practices considered to be detrimental to the public interest with the offending parties and publicize any such evidence.

Second step:

1. That an inquiry be conducted under the Public Inquiries Act of Ontario, with both public and in camera hearings.

2. That such an inquiry be conducted by the Ontario Food Council to be constituted or reconstituted as to its members as is appropriate in these circumstances.

3. That appropriate legal and accounting personnel be retained to conduct a thorough investigation with power to summon witnesses and to examine books of accounts.

4. That such an inquiry investigate the British Columbia recent studies into discount practices; the Alberta situation with regard to vertical integration and loss of competition; and the American experience with reference to state laws re retail pricing.

Finally, my views on discount practices can be summed up in a phrase: If the chains have nothing to hide, they have nothing to fear from an inquiry; if they have something to hide, it should be exposed.

Mr. Speaker: Honourable members have heard those sections of the report they deemed advisable to have read into the record.

Hon. W. Newman: May I just make a few brief comments on the motion and on a few aspects of the inquiry?

As I interpret the standing committee's recommendation, the other parties want a public inquiry to investigate just about every conceivable aspect of the retail food industry in this province.

Mr. Foulds: Not a bad idea.

Mr. Nixon: That was a majority decision of the committee.

Mr. Swart: Difficult.

Hon. W. Newman: I said at the beginning and throughout the hearings that I wanted to keep an open mind on the subject. I said I wanted to have all the facts before committing my ministry or the government to any further investigation of the food chains. The question we have to ask ourselves is whether facts have been presented which would demand a further look into the food industry. I am not ruling out a public inquiry of some kind.

Mr. Breithaupt: However.

Hon. W. Newman: But I must remind members that any large scale inquiry, such as a public inquiry or a royal commission, is not to be lightly undertaken.

Mr. S. Smith: Like the LaMarsh commission.

Hon. W. Newman: In fact, a public inquiry into the aspects that the opposition wants investigated would probably be the longest, costliest and most complex study in the history of this province.

Mr. Roy: You are afraid of cost now.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Only if you employ Judy LaMarsh.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Just another spendthrift Liberal, that's what she is.

Hon. W. Newman: The number of commodities and items for sale in the average supermarket would guarantee that. We produce 200 commodities in Ontario that are sold in supermarkets.

Mr. Foulds: John Rhodes could have done it cheap when he was just a cop on the beat.

Hon. W. Newman: Most have their own set of production methods, handling requirements and marketing customs. The committee heard over and over again that people would not testify because they feared reprisals. Under the most highly confidential circumstances, Mr. Poole could still only get a few people to talk to him in private.

Mr. S. Smith: You were a great help.

Hon. W. Newman: The recommendations I made to the committee yesterday probably would have given producers and suppliers the opportunity to come forward and testify on a confidential basis. One of my main concerns was to provide a forum where people could be heard in confidence so they would not feel fear of reprisals.

Mr. S. Smith: Not if they don't say anything.

Hon. W. Newman: Before I go any further on this matter, I should like to review Mr. Poole's report further; a report and testimony of the British Columbia standing committee; and the actions taken or under way in other jurisdictions, including the activities of the federal Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. After I have fully studied the material already available to us, and if I find it desirable to launch a full scale public inquiry, I will not hesitate to recommend this course of action to cabinet.

Members should be reminded of the Premier's (Mr. Davis) comments earlier this afternoon, particularly on the question of representatives to such an investigating body from both political and partisan groups. If such a commission is established, it must be a completely independent commission.

Mr. S. Smith: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise and discuss this report. I want to say at the outset that I was most impressed with the report given to the committee by its counsel, a counsel who if I'm not mistaken was recommended by the Minister of Agriculture and Food, and a person who the minister has even recommended might be the chairman of the committee that the minister would prefer to see in existence according to his own suggestion at the meeting of the standing committee on resources development. Clearly, he must have confidence in this individual, and I most certainly do as well.

The report given to the committee by the counsel was in the strongest conceivable terms. He as well as I and other members of the committee, with the exception of those who represent the government party, were very impressed with the kind of information that was put before the committee, the danger of excessive concentration of power within the food industry leading ultimately, if continued at the present trend and with the present practices, to the possibility of a very few large corporations, vertically integrated and horizontally powerful, being able to pretty well exact what they wish from the marketplace; furthermore, little by little, as the number of processors, canners and so on would be reduced in the province of Ontario, leaving the farmers pretty well as the captives of those few that remain.

The suggestion the minister made to the committee and which he's repeated here today—and that's the only reason I address myself to it—is that rather than have a public inquiry, with the powers under the Public Inquiries Act to see the books of the companies, to have testimony under oath and so on, he would like to have, as he said again here today, a committee of three people that he recommended who presumably would be able to ask questions and presumably would be able to examine certain matters. They could certainly examine each other, I suspect, and possibly those other people who are willing to come forward and say what they please, but it would not have the power to examine the books of the companies, and consequently would be pretty well a useless exercise.

Our select committee met for a very long time. With the exception of one particular evening meeting I was there, I believe, for every minute of those meetings, and I certainly found them most fascinating. I tell you that the committee has come to a conclusion and it does not require now some further committee to study the results of this committee. We're not dealing now with property tax reform, we're now dealing with something that can be dealt with in a straightforward and reasonable manner.

It's obvious that the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, people, whose opinions ought to be of some interest to the Minister of Agriculture and Food, have unanimously and enthusiastically supported the need for a full scale, independent investigation under the Public Inquiries Act.

There seems to be some question about this business of a nominee from the various caucuses. Let us be clear: it was never the intention, and this was made clear in the committee, that these would be members of the caucus nor even members of the party. They would merely be people knowledgeable in the food industry and suggested by all three parties. If that is in some way very objectionable, if some deep principle of parliamentary history that momentarily evades me bothers the Premier of the province, and he wishes to implement the report of the select committee in some way slightly different from that of the committee—in other words, with a nominee of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, a nominee of the consumers' association and some other neutral person; and I don't think it has to be a judge, there's no allegation of illegality or anything that requires, necessarily, an advanced background in the criminal law or anything of this kind—it seems to me we would be willing to accept some reasonable point of view from the government in this regard.

But certainly we insist that an investigation be held; and that it be under the Public Inquiries Act, not under the Ontario Food Council. I'm sorry to say this: without meaning in any way to demean the worthy civil servants on that body and other representatives on the body, the testimony and the view of the federation is very clear that the food council is not the place for it. That was even the view of one of the members of the food council who represents the consumer interest in Ontario.

It's perfectly clear that what's required is a swift answer and the adoption of this particular report. I cannot understand why there should be this tremendous reluctance. The government is still free—as long as it complies with the spirit, meaning and intent of the report—it is still free, I am sure, to make small changes in its implementation, but very small indeed.

My view is that we would have much more impact if all parties voted together to adopt the report. Naturally, the vote was not unanimous in the committee because the government party had from the very start indicated a predilection in the other direction. Nonetheless, and we will divide, I assume, in this House, I presume that the report will be adopted. I most certainly hope so. Then, I presume and expect that the government will, in the democratic fashion comply with the basic wishes of the House, consisting as it does of democratically elected members representing the people of Ontario.

Mr. MacDonald: I am a little puzzled as to why we are having this debate. We have seen the whole issue. I don't know why the minister led off and started the debate. We have gone through this for three or four weeks. The minister has had all of his say. He said nothing new that he hadn't said two or three, four or five times in the committee, therefore we have nothing to do but respond in a repetitious way.

If the government is going to block this, they block it in the cabinet. Why are we wasting the time of the House in debating the thing when we have had such an exhaustive debate in the committee? Since we have had the debate, let me make two or three points briefly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Warner: Set a precedent, Don.

Mr. MacDonald: The purpose of that committee was to examine whether or not there was a prima facie case for a fuller investigation. The minister himself expressed some concerns about the two per cent discount that was revealed about six or seven weeks ago. He was sufficiently concerned about it that the chairman of his food council went to the supermarkets and persuaded them to withdraw it.

It's a very strange situation. It is not illegal, yet as soon as it is raised, they retreat from it. They did it in 1972, they have done it two or three times in the interval, they have done it again. If it isn't illegal, why do they retreat? If it isn't illegal, why does the minister get concerned about it as soon as the spotlight of public attention has been turned on it once again?

The two per cent discount is only one of a wide number of merchandising practices that were considered in the committee. I just want to reiterate what I said by way of a question to the Premier this afternoon. The summation of counsel, whose name was suggested by the minister, to the committee, and which the committee by majority view adopted, was that the thrust of the evidence that was given publicly, and even more the confirmation of that evidence given privately to him in "in camera" sessions, was that there was a prima facie case for questionable practices, therefore we should have a fuller investigation.

What kind of an investigation? Independent is the key word. If it were going to be under the food council it would not be an independent inquiry because the food council—because of its very structure, made up of processors and wholesalers and retailers who presumably were going to investigate their own questionable practices—is obviously on the face of it not the way to go about it. It wouldn't be an independent inquiry.

What has been proposed is that there shall be a committee that will be representative of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture and the consumers, the producers of food and the consumers of food in this province, and a nominee from each of the parties.

Now I'm very interested in the political tack that the Premier has taken this afternoon; that this is not going to mean an independent inquiry, it is going to be prejudiced and with political bias. It is very fascinating that when the government party, the one party alone appoints them, presumably they are above politics, but if everybody makes an appointment so that you have a balance of any prejudice that might exist then that becomes partisan.

A few years ago, a well known lawyer in the city of Toronto on a CBC panel was discussing the impartiality of royal commissions. He made a flat assertion. He said that most people appointed to royal commissions are appointed to bring in the report that the government wants.

Hon. W. Newman: That's just nonsense and you know that.

Mr. Hodgson: We don't believe that.

Mr. MacDonald: Members don't believe that? I quoted from a distinguished lawyer who has observed and studied the situation.

Hon. Mr. Welch: What a slur on the commission.

Mr. MacDonald: We want an independent inquiry. We want it under the Public Inquiries Act. We want appointments from nominees who are going to be representative of a spectrum of view rather than just the views of the government. The plain fact of the matter is that through all of the operations of the resources development committee, the government members on the committee were a cheering squad for the supermarkets.

Hon. W. Newman: That is not true.

Mr. Eaton: That's a lie.

Mr. S. Smith: It is factually correct.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The member for Middlesex will withdraw that comment.

Mr. Eaton: Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the comment that it is a lie that—

Mr. Speaker: Unequivocally.

Mr. Eaton: But he was interpreting our position on that committee to his own political advantage.

Mr. MacDonald: I want to make a final point in a comment on the remarks of the minister, and the Premier earlier, when he said something to the effect that this isn't the kind of inquiry that the OFA wants. The Leader of the Opposition has pointed out that the OFA and some of its key people attended the meeting yesterday, heard what had happened and at an OFA board meeting passed a resolution unanimously and enthusiastically supporting what the committee had done.

Let me read two paragraphs from the press release. "The recommendation for such an inquiry was given earlier in the day by the standing committee on resources development, which has been holding extensive hearings into the various merchandising practices of some supermarket chains. 'The OFA is very happy about the recommendation', said Mr. Hannam, OFA president. 'We feel it is a tremendous victory and we will certainly provide as much assistance as possible. It is now up to the government. The OFA simply will not accept anything less than an independent investigation.'"

Hon. W. Newman: Independent, not partisan.

Mr. MacDonald: That is an independent investigation that will be representative of the producers and of the consumers, and include three other people who will be nominated by each of the parties and not by the minister's party to serve his purposes.

Hon. W. Newman: They said an independent investigation, stop trying to play games with this report.

Mr. Eaton: I want to say a few words on this, because as was the case throughout the hearings—

Mr. Roy: The apologist for the chain stores.

Mr. Eaton: —the Leader of the Opposition tended to interpret things for people that were not their positions.

Mr. Samis: Whom are you defending now?

Mr. Eaton: He tended to say things during the discussion that people had said that they hadn't actually said.

Hon. Mr. Bernier: What else is new?

Mr. Eaton: He did it just now when he said that the members of our committee were not supportive of Mr. Poole's report.

Mr. Deans: That's right.

Mr. Eaton: I want to indicate to you, Mr. Speaker, that we did not vote against Mr. Poole's report; we indicated our objections to the amendments that the member for York South proposed to his report. He stands up, all the time and says how great Mr. Poole's report was. Then he takes a section out of it interprets it and does what he wants with it.

Mr. S. Smith: You want the food council and we don't.

Mr. Eaton: We were supportive of what Mr. Poole had indicated, that such an inquiry be conducted by the Ontario Food Council—

Mr. MacDonald: Did the member listen to the minister's questioning?

Mr. Eaton: —to be constituted or reconstituted as to its members appropriate in the circumstances. That meant the members of the food council who would have been serving on there would be unbiased in the situation that faces them at that particular time.

I would also like to register my objection to the statement of the member for York South, that we were supportive of the chain stores in that committee.

Mr. MacDonald: Did you ever listen to the member for Renfrew South (Mr. Yaka-buski)?

Mr. Eaton: We were trying to ask unbiased questions. We were not trying at any time, as the Leader of the Opposition did, to be rude or ignorant, or beat the people who were before the committee.

Mr. MacDonald: You didn't have to try.

Mr. Eaton: We were the ones who were being objective and fair during the whole debate.

Mr. Speaker: Does any other member wish to participate in this debate?

The motion before the House is for the adoption of the report. Shall the motion carry?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the adoption of the report will please say "aye". All those opposed will please say "nay". In my opinion, the "ayes" have it.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT COMMITTEE

Mr. Gaunt from the standing social development committee reported the following resolution:

STANDING PROCEDURAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Mr. Breaugh from the standing procedural affairs committee presented the committee's report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee has met with the three House leaders and wishes to report two agreements concerning the practices of the House.

1. If the adoption of the committee report is moved during routine proceedings and substantial debate is required, the chairperson of the committee presenting the report should move the adjournment of the debate on the motion for adoption. The time for the debate by the House will be determined by the House leaders in consultation with the chairperson of the committee, preferably on Thursday evening.

2. When a petition is presented pursuant to provisional order 7, Mr. Speaker should inform the House of the receipt of the petition and report the assignment of the petition to the committee requested. The chairperson of the committee concerned should then arrange the allocation of times for the examination of the concerned report.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON COMPANY LAW

Mr. Breithaupt: Mr Speaker, as chairman of the select committee on company law, I am pleased to present to the Legislature the committee's second report on the insurance industry. This report is again concerned with automobile insurance. Bound copies for each of the members will be received by next week. In the meantime, a summary of our recommendations is now being placed in the mailbox of each member and is being distributed to the press gallery.

The report deals with five particular areas. The first is that of implementing compulsory automobile insurance. The first report of the select committee recommended compulsory automobile insurance and the government has announced the acceptance of this matter in principle. The committee, accordingly, felt obliged to suggest a program to resolve the difficulties in this field, and we have done so.

We then considered the problems of automobile accident compensation and have recommended, by a majority, a modified no-fault scheme which would continue to allow non-economic losses generally for pain and suffering in certain defined situations.

The third area of our study was with respect to the government's presence in the automobile insurance industry. The committee has concluded that Ontario can be better served under a system of automobile insurance operated within the private sector than by the adoption of a government automobile insurance system. We do, however, make certain recommendations for a stronger presence in rate regulation so as to provide Ontario with the open competition form of such regulation.

Fourthly, we have reviewed the subject of marketing, administration and claims adjusting costs, and we have made recommendations to encourage premiums savings to the public.

Finally, we have considered the present rating classification system. We have concluded that the traditional classifications of age, sex and marital status are not adequate. We believe that such classifications would better be replaced by classes based on driving experience, driving record and miles per year driven. In addition, incentives for good driving must be more strongly adopted by the insurance industry, in our opinion.

Mr. Speaker, your committee will now turn to the other lines of general insurance, namely, property and casualty. We encourage public and industry comment on problems in those fields, and we look forward to the public hearings which will begin here at Queen's Park on those subjects on July 18.

[4:00]

I would like to take this occasion to express the appreciation of our committee to Mr. George Ness, QC, who has served as counsel to the committee, and to Mrs. Frances Nokes, who continues as our clerk. Both Mr. Ness and Mrs. Nokes are in the gallery. As well, Mr. Paul Boddy, Mr. Peter McKelvey and Miss Ludmilla Jagiellicz, all of Woods Gordon, have been of great value as consultants to our committee.

STANDING PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Mr. T. P. Reid from the standing public accounts committee presented the committee's interim report.

Mr. T. P. Reid: I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if I might have two words. One is that this is the second interim report from the public accounts committee. We will be tabling our final report in the fall and would ask that it be debated at that time.

I would also like to inform the House, sir, that there is a subcommittee of the public accounts committee set up, with the member for Carleton (Mr. Handleman), the member for Sudbury (Mr. Germa) and myself as members, to look into the procedures of the public accounts committee and to make recommendations to the committee and the House.

STANDING ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE COMMITTEE

Mr. Philip from the standing administration of justice committee presented the committee's report, which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bills with certain amendments:

Bill 7, An Act to revise the Securities Act.

Bill 8, An Act to regulate Trading in Commodity Futures Contracts.

Bill 9, An Act to amend the Business Corporations Act.

Ordered for third reading.

SUMMER RECESS

Hon. Mr. Welch moved that when the House adjourns for the summer recess it do stand adjourned until a date to be named by the Lieutenant Governor by her proclamation.

Motion agreed to.

Mrs. Campbell: No, a specified date.

Mr. Kerrio: When does it recess?

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS

LINE FENCES ACT

Hon. Mr. McKeough moved first reading of Bill 135, An Act to revise the Line Fences Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Ruston: You want an election on that, eh, Darcy?

Mr. Breithaupt: You have been given all the important jobs.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, in introducing the Line Fences Act, 1978, today for first reading, I would like to say that this bill is the result of lengthy discussions with a number of interested parties, particularly with representatives of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture and the Rural Ontario Municipal Association.

It was agreed by all that revisions to the present act were necessary to deal with present-day circumstances. A simpler and quicker method for settling fencing disputes in both rural and urban areas, and in agricultural and non-agricultural areas was needed, one that ensures that the interests of each of the adjoining owners are dealt with equitably. Honourable members will find a summary of the revised method of arbitration attached to their copies of this introductory statement.

At this time I would like to outline very briefly where the two bills differ. In the new bill as opposed to the present Line Fences Act the distinction between occupied and non-occupied land is being removed. A line fence will no longer be mandatory in every case but only where one adjoining owner wants a fence. Where adjoining owners cannot reach agreement, one owner may simply notify the clerk of the local municipality that he wants the fence viewers to arbitrate the dispute. If, however, the municipal council has passed a bylaw providing that the clerk is not to be involved, the owner will have to arrange the arbitration himself, as with the present act.

The options of the fence viewers in making their award are being clarified and broadened. The appeal of either owner from the fence viewers' award will be to the small claims court rather than to the county or district court. If one owner fails to obey the award and the other owner does the work and wants to recover the value of that work, he will have the fence viewers reconvene to certify the amount owed him by the defaulting owner rather than having to take action in the small claims court.

In addition to the methods of the existing act for collecting the amount owed him by the defaulting owner, the other owner will be able, if the municipal council provides by bylaw, to collect the amount from the municipal treasury. The municipality will then collect the amount from the defaulting owner as taxes with interest.

Mr. Speaker, in developing this legislation, we have not been able to incorporate every recommendation submitted. However, the bill does reflect the many agreements and compromises reached during the discussion and I believe it will receive very considerable support from interested residents, municipalities and associations. Government looks forward to receiving and discussing comments and recommendations for changes to the bill over the summer months and for consideration by the Legislature in the fall.

CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY EMPLOYMENT ACT

Hon. B. Stephenson moved first reading of Bill 136, An Act to Stabilize Employment of Tradesmen in the Construction Industry.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Speaker, this act is in fact enabling legislation where in the opinion of the Minister of Labour it is necessary to eliminate or reduce instability in the employment of tradesmen in the construction industry or to promote employment in that industry. The minister, subject to the approval of the Lieutenant Governor in Council, may in fact enact or bring into effect a code or codes of employment practices establishing some measures and procedures respecting the employment of tradesmen in construction, including provisions that tradesmen permanently resident in Ontario shall be given preference in employment.

METRIC CONVERSION STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT

Hon. Mr. Rhodes moved first reading of Bill 137, the Metric Conversion Statute Law Amendment Act, 1978.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Mr. Speaker, the amendments in this act have been requested by the private sector and municipalities, through the national sector plans, to ensure that the conversion process in Canada, as established by the national body, is not inhibited by Ontario legislation. The use of an omnibus bill is to save the House time since all acts included in the bill are being converted for the same purpose. The conversions in the act are mathematical in nature and do not change the intent or policy of the individual acts.

Some changes have been rounded off to avoid large figures of several decimal places. All conversions are explained in the bill, and where a number have been rounded off, the exact metric equivalent is included in the explanatory notes. Altogether there are 57 different acts that are involved in this bill for amendment, coming from 10 different ministries.

The act comes into force on a date to be proclaimed by the Lieutenant Governor. Parts of the act can be proclaimed at different times on the recommendation to cabinet by the responsible minister.

MUNICIPALITY OF METROPOLITAN TORONTO AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. S. Smith moved first reading of Bill 138, An Act to amend the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. S. Smith: The purpose of the bill is to give each of the area municipalities, in the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto the status of a city municipality. The newly-established cities of East York, Etobicoke, North York, Scarborough and York would continue to receive provincial aid for a 10-year period as if they were township municipalities.

HOSPITAL ABORTIONS PROCEDURES ACT

Mr. Sweeney moved first reading of Bill 139, An Act respecting Hospital Administrative Procedures relating to Abortions performed in Ontario.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Sweeney: The bill establishes several administrative procedures governing the manner in which Ontario hospitals provide services and facilities for the performance of abortions in Ontario.

The bill requires that a patient be provided with information concerning the life condition of the unborn child, the risks to her and the social services available to care for the child, before consenting to an abortion.

Where a physician determines that an unborn child has the potential to remain alive outside the womb of the mother, the physician shall use medical procedures designed to maintain the life of the child. A second physician must be in attendance in these circumstances.

The bill provides that hospital facilities and services shall be made available if the continuation of the pregnancy is likely to endanger the life or cause serious and permanent injury to the physical or mental health of the patient. The bill further provides for continuous review by the Minister of Health of abortions performed in Ontario to ensure compliance with the laws relating to the performance of abortions.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON NOTICE PAPER

Hon. Mr. Welch: I wish to table the answers to questions 99, 100, and 103 standing on the notice paper. I wish to table as well the answers to questions 101, 102 and 108 standing on the notice paper. (See appendix, page 3846.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

CONSUMER PROTECTION AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. B. Newman moved second reading of Bill 100, An Act to amend the Consumer Protection Act.

Mr. B. Newman: Mr. Speaker, in rising to make comments concerning Bill 100, I would like to start by informing the House that my comments in no way indicate that I oppose the principle of computerizing "checking out" in a supermarket.

My whole interest is in the fact that the consumer might not have the opportunity for comparison shopping.

For some years now, with the increasing concentration of the retail food business into fewer and fewer hands, the increasing size of food stores, the increasing number of check-out counters, and the longer and longer check-out lines, it was only natural the retail industry would have to look to automation to speed up the check-out time of the individual shopper. Failure to do so would prompt the shopper to take his or her business to the retailer providing the better service.

In this new electronic age, with the advent of the laser beam and scanning devices, and the development of product identity codes, a way to speed checking out was finally devised. The new method of the UPC—the universal product code—finally reached the market. But as it did, Mr. Speaker, the retailer assumed that the universal product code was sufficient, and so he decided not to mark individual items with a price tag.

This led consumer groups, as well as the labour union movement, to become seriously concerned—consumer groups, because comparison shopping by the elimination of individual item pricing; and labour unions, because automation could eliminate or substantially reduce employee numbers. Both concerns were very legitimate.

I don't oppose the use of the universal product code and quicker checking out, or even the use of the computer. In my own community, the concerns of the consumer were expressed back in 1977. In fact, on April 15 I received a communication from a Mrs. A. Ashwell, who was writing to me on behalf of the London Conference of the United Church Women.

Their recommendation was: "Since the supermarket industry is concurrently in the process of introducing the use of the universal product code on all items sold in their stores, which would result in the possible elimination of individual item pricing, thereby denying the consumer the right of comparison shopping, we ask you to petition your government to enact adequate protective legislation to ensure the rights of the consumer to the privilege of comparison shopping by individual item pricing".

That resolution was approved by the Devine Street United Church of Sarnia. It was also approved by the St. Paul's United Church Women's Group in Harwich Township, Kent County, and also by another United Church group in Charing Cross.

Naturally, they would have contacted me, Mr. Speaker, because I am probably not within their geographic area, but because I introduced legislation back early in 1977.

The labour unions, on hearing the action taken by the United Church Women, also decided they would urge laws covering price tags. As a result, the Windsor and District Labour Council decided they would press government for government legislation that would force retailers to retain individual prices on all items sold.

The council—that is, the Windsor and District Labour Council, which represents 38,000 area trade unionists—adopted that approach after hearing a report from a Mr. Ron Varley, president of Local 14045, United Steelworkers of America.

Mr. Varley, whose local represents Dominion Stores Limited workers in Windsor and Amherstburg, argued that the removal of individual price labels in supermarkets would create "the biggest consumer rip-off this country has ever seen".

He said that the universal product code, which makes computerized check-outs possible, is now on most items, and that it is only a matter of time before prices are shown only on store shelves. Mr. Varley said most supermarket unions now have contract protection against layoffs because of computerization, but remain concerned, as consumers, about the effects of ending individual pricing.

Even the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations in a press release of July 14, 1977—the minister of that time was the honourable Sidney Handleman—is quoted as saying: "Over the last year and a half my colleagues and I have received literally thousands of communications ranging from expressions of mild concern to outright alarm over any suggestion to remove individual pricing." However, no action was taken by the ministry. As a result, I had research check with the federal authorities, that is with the Ministry of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. They told us there was no legislation pending and they didn't know if they contemplated introducing legislation.

In checking with the Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations—at that time, the honourable Sidney Handleman—likewise, we were told that there was no indication of legislation being introduced on this matter. At no time did anybody say this matter was not a provincial matter. As a result, on April 25, 1977, I introduced the legislation we are debating this afternoon, that is, An Act to amend the Consumer Protection Act.

Certain events intervened immediately after that. As a result, when we did come back, on July 7, 1977, I reintroduced the original bill. Today, approximately one year since its last introduction, we have An Act to amend the Consumer Protection Act.

It is a very simple act. It defines the computer code. The definition reads: "The computer code means a marking that is designed to be read and recorded by a computer device for the purpose of calculating the purchase price of a product offered for sale and includes the universal product code."

The act requires individual purchase marking and section 2 of section 47(a) reads: "No retail seller shall offer for sale a product that is marked with a computer code unless the individual purchase price of such product is clearly expressed on the product, its wrapper or its container." The purpose of that is so the individual would have the privilege of comparison shopping.

Just to point out to those who may read this debate, I wanted to let the public know the universal product code is that symbol on boxes, cans or jars represented by 10 numbers and a series of lines and spaces. The first five numbers represent the company marking the product and these numbers are assigned to each company in the United States and Canada by a data bank. The last five numbers are selected by the manufacturer to represent a certain product. For example, the symbol 5700000305 is the code. 57000 represents the H. J. Heinz Company. The code 00305 is the code for Heinz ketchup in the 11 ounce bottle.

Each of the numbers in the universal price code is represented by two black lines and two white spaces. The scanner reads the width of the lines and the width of the spaces. It does not read the numbers. Even though stores are not ready to use the universal price code system most manufacturers in Canada have included them on their product labels.

When the federal government bill was passed requiring them to have bilingual labels, rather than to change labels two or three times—which is very costly—most manufacturers made all of the changes at one time so that the labels were now bilingual, in metric measurement and contained the universal product code.

There are no prices on the UPC, universal product code. The universal product code only identifies the manufacturer and the item.

As a completely computerized operation the cashier passes each of the customer's items over a scanning unit. The unit identifies the symbol on each item. The scanner is connected to a computer terminal in which the symbol items and prices are stored. As the scanner identifies each item the terminal automatically retrieves the item's name and price.

The terminal also displays a description of the item and its price at the cash register, performs all the calculations for tax, and takes into account store and manufacturers' coupons, figures out the total, calculates the change from the cash offered; and its final function is to print a customer receipt containing description of all items, prices and total and so on.

What are some of the advantages of the scanning system? Well, consumers will not be able to deface the symbol or switch prices. The lines and spaces are correlated and the coding system and price are dependent on each other.

If a consumer does try to alter the lines or spaces, the scanner will not accept the symbol and a beep sound will warn the cashier that the item has not been accepted.

The scanning operation will likewise cut check-out time by perhaps as much as one half. The cashier will not be able to ring in the wrong price because she won't be ringing in prices.

Consumers will get itemized tape receipts as an aid to planning food budgets and future shopping and keeping up with the trend in food prices.

Another of the plus features is one manufacturer and stores are very cautious about—reducing the risk of food poisoning.

If any item is found to be bad, manufacturers notify stores and the stores must take all the suspicious stock off the shelves.

There is a risk, though, of a customer in the store buying the item before the stock boys get the items removed. With the new system, the UPC code would be deleted immediately from the computer program. Then when the cashier passes the item over the scanner, a beep will sound a warning to her that the item is not acceptable. The stock would be removed from the shelves as well and this would eliminate any possibility of a customer walking out of the store with a potentially dangerous product.

The store manager could also determine how much of any given item he had sold and on what days, and so on. The scanning system would also allow the store manager to determine what hours and days are the busiest, and how many check-out lines they should have open, thereby eliminating long, long lineups.

The scanner would read the code even on dented cans and packages and the computer would correctly print out the description of the item and its price.

Occasionally a black felt pen is used to cross out most of the lines and spaces, leaving only a small portion of the symbol for the scanner to read.

The scanner again correctly can read the symbol, print out the description and the price. The system is fast and it is accurate, but how about protection for the consumer in the advent of all of this new technology?

It is the store's thinking at present that they don't have to unit price the articles because they will have the price listed on the shelves. However, we also know that the elderly quite often have difficulty bending down the shelves to simply notice the price listed on the shelves. It would be much better to have it on each individual item since the retailer quite often wishes to record the price only on the shelf, but not on each individual item. I pointed out a lot of savings when using the computer, so there must be some type of trade-off. It will save on employee help; it will computerize the whole check-out process; it will get the customer through the lines more quickly, but we likewise want to have the opportunity of comparison shopping in return for that.

Miracle Food Marts in Toronto have two stores, I understand, equipped with a computer, but they still put individual item price stickers on the majority of their products. If not item priced, then we will find that the consumer just cannot comparison shop.

Will there be safeguards built into UPC? Yes; safeguards not only on the prices going into the computer but also on the person programming the computer, so say those who operate the supermarkets. Remember, it is dependent on the person programming the prices into the computer and it is also dependent on the stock person. He or she has to put the right size of can in the right place on the right shelf with the right shelf-price. That is if there is no individual item price. There are many possibilities for human error that that is practically impossible to do. As a result, individual item pricing is an absolute requisite.

Itemized receipt tapes are excellent. Even though they may be excellent, they still don't indicate, in many instances, the weight of the item purchased. For example, they do not identify between a 10-ounce can or a 19-ounce can of the same item. So the customer may be paying for a 19-ounce can, or have purchased a 19-ounce can when he or she wanted only a 10-ounce can.

In the United States, there was a big hue and cry about the system when it was first implemented. Maryland immediately, on hearing that hue and cry, passed legislation making it mandatory for all stores to unit price all items and now many other states are trying to pass similar types of legislation.

There is another problem too with computerization when individual pricing is not adopted by a retailer. The retailer could very easily change prices in the middle of a day, through the computer, but if items are individually priced, he cannot do that. He cannot double stick, double label, double tag, or the individual item, because that is contrary to federal legislation.

With the computer price only, there would be no way an individual could check the retailer to determine whether he had changed his prices in the middle of the day or at the beginning of the day, even though he may have advertised certain items at a given price.

The state of Michigan attempted to pass a bill in 1976. Because it was complicated, it was put off. The governor of the state vetoed it. However, the Detroit Free Press wrote an editorial headlined "No-Frill Pricing Bill Needed", on July 11, 1976, as a result of the governor's veto. I am quoting from the editorial:

"We believe that there is a legitimate public interest in assuring that retailers, in embracing the universal product code, do not abandon the price marking of an individual item on their shelves. The marking of individual items is an essential aid to intelligent shopping. The universal product code can produce worthwhile efficiencies even if the individual prices are retained. In fact, grocery chains have begun backing-off their original intention to abandon individual price posting."

By the way, since that time the state of Michigan has passed legislation that does require individual item pricing even though their legislation exempts certain high volume items such as milk from the requirement of individual purchase pricing.

I don't have statistics for the Ontario area to the same extent as I have them for the U.S. In the city of Detroit, there are only five supermarkets with scanners. But they foresee the scanner having such a tremendous advantage to them as far as inventory control—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. B. Newman: Twenty minutes? Mr. Speaker, I could carry on at some length, but I would like to close by saying that even though price marking does cost money, labour savings more than offset that difference.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. B. Newman: I will pass on the balance of my material to the member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Kerrio).

Mr. M. N. Davison: Mr. Speaker, I would like to personally congratulate the member for Windsor-Walkerville for bringing forward this bill. I think it is a very important piece of legislation dealing with an important issue. It is much more important than the last debate the member and I had on supermarkets, which involved the menace created by housewives careering about recklessly in supermarkets with shopping carts without signal lights. This, however, is really important.

It is interesting to note from where we sit that this bill should be brought forward by a member of the Liberal Party, because the federal Liberal Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, some two years ago, said he would protect consumers from any problems that might arise from this new pricing system, but after the chain stores had had a chance to twist his arm and whisper in his ear, he backed off, and the federal Liberals sold out the consumers to the chain stores on this matter. So I trust the members will put a word in the ear of the federal Liberals so they might better understand the problems presented by this new system.

Bill 100, An Act to amend the Consumer Protection Act, reflects the policy of the New Democratic Party. Some time ago, at one of our conventions, the following resolution was passed: "Resolved: that the Ontario New Democratic Party will press the Ontario government to bring in legislation to protect consumers requiring the supermarket industry to continue the practice of marking the purchase price on each item for sale." The New Democratic Party has indeed done this over the past number of years, and my colleagues the members for York South (Mr. MacDonald) and Beaches-Woodbine (Ms. Bryden) particularly, have done so with singular skill on a great many occasions, and I would congratulate them.

For anyone who has not been doing any shopping over the past couple of years perhaps an explanation of what the UPC system is, should be put on the record. The UPC system is identical, of course, to the Canadian grocery product code, or the CGPC. It is a stamp-sized rectangular black and white group of lines on the product package, and with its vertical lines of varying width and a 10-digit identification number, it can provide something in the order of 10 trillion individual machine-readable numbers. Those then are read by the electric scanner at the checkout, which is then informed by a computer of the current price in the store.

While most products at the supermarket carry the UPC, only a handful of stores in Canada actually make any use of it. The system is very unpopular, both with individual consumers and with consumer groups such as the Consumers' Association of Canada. Because of that, Steinberg's, which is the first store to adopt the computerized system, has decided it will continue individual price marking on its packages, even in the stores that are using the system.

In Ontario, as the member for Windsor-Walkerville pointed out quite correctly, we have lagged very far behind on this issue. In the United States a large number of the states, and an even greater number of the cities, have passed legislation requiring that the individual item pricing be maintained in those jurisdictions.

Frankly, I believe the industry would be far from unwilling to accept the intent of this bill and maintain item pricing, even if it continues with the computerized checkout and the use of the UPC. The Grocery Products Manufacturers of Canada have stated: "Even in the event that the government action is taken regarding price marking of merchandise, there is no reason to expect the elimination of the electronic store system and universal product code. Deducting the 19 per cent for the saving in price marking, GPMC estimated, yearly savings would be $97,000 on an equipment investment of $150,000. Thus other economies would be sufficient for the program to advance as planned."

There is no guarantee whatsoever that any savings resulting from the new system will be passed along by the industry to the consumers, and I suspect that as usual the extra money will go into extra profits for the large chain stores. I further have serious doubts about the capacity of some stores to be able to keep shelf pricing accurate and up to date.

Without item pricing the consumer has no knowledge of or protection against instantaneous price changes in a store. Without item pricing, consumer price consciousness at the time of product use will be greatly lessened, and I don't think that's a useful direction to go in. Without item pricing, comparison shopping will become so complicated a procedure that it will be almost impossible.

For all of those and other obvious reasons, I and my party oppose the adoption of the computerized checkout UPC system to the exclusion of item pricing. Therefore, we will be quite pleased and happy to support this bill on second reading.

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and participate in the debate this afternoon on Bill 100. I am particularly pleased to involve myself in this debate, bearing in mind that the sponsor of the bill is the member for Windsor-Walkerville, whose bills in the past I have always found to be fundamentally sound in principle. I have always admired the logic he displays in the issues he brings before the House, such that I think we can overlook his shortcomings such as one finds in his choice of partisan political affiliations.

I recall having supported in principle his bill dealing with the recognition of support for the physically disabled in the Ontario Human Rights Code. Although at the time I opposed the structuring of the bill, I certainly didn't oppose the principle. Here too I wish to express support for the bill presented today by the member for Windsor-Walkerville.

Not only I but, I am sure, a lot of consumers are concerned about the impact the universal product code's implementation would have on the public if it were to negate, do away with and replace the use of the unit pricing system. I know that the Consumers' Association of Canada has expressed a great deal of concern in this area. At this point in time, it continues, and rightfully so, to oppose any removal of unit pricing from the marketplace. That particular body has been monitoring the introduction of the universal product code and the automated checkouts over some period of time. Certainly the views they have expressed are based on a thorough review and monitoring of this situation.

I have been quite impressed with the extent to which the sponsor of the bill has researched his subject. I found it most interesting to get an understanding and appreciation of how the coding system works. I must be quite candid: I wasn't fully appreciative of how the system works. In fact, the member went into such great detail on the subject that for a moment I thought—

Mr. Kerrio: He was in the business.

Mr. Williams: —he was considering that at the time he retires from his present occupation he might take up a position as a salesman with one of those companies that have developed this system. He certainly makes a convincing argument. I realize that in making that argument, he shows there is some merit to the system but it shouldn't be implemented at the expense of the consumer public. His point is well taken.

The fact is, of course, that there is a fundamental principle here that must not be overlooked. That is the fact that when a consumer goes to purchase a product in a food store, he must have the ability to determine what the price of that particular commodity is. There are three essential concerns to any purchaser of a product, and in particular a food product, whether it's in a food chain store or in the individual corner market. The person must be able to reasonably determine the quantity of the product, the quality of the product and the price of the product and to compare all three of those factors against other similar competitive products on the shelves in these stores.

To eliminate any one of those opportunities is prejudicing the position of the individual consumer. For this reason, until such time as a mechanism can be devised to take advantage of the universal product coding system and yet preserve some element or means by which the individual purchaser can have an awareness of the individual unit price, this type of legislation is needed to bridge that gap period. I'm satisfied, however, with technology being such as it is, some means will be found to meet both needs and that if such legislation should come on to the books in future years, it may prove itself to be redundant.

It's quite apparent today when one goes into a supermarket that the present pricing of goods on shelves leaves something to be desired because of the great quantity of individual products on the shelves and the variety of products on the shelves. With the shelves themselves being stacked, it's hard to determine which price relates to which shelf and to which commodity from the way they're presently labelled on the shelves. If individual units are not priced, it is not sufficient under today's circumstances to rely solely on the tagging they use on the shelves in the stores because of the confusion created in the purchaser's mind.

An interesting development, however, which I've noticed in recent times in supermarkets and which may prove to be one of the compromises that could be arrived at, short of the necessity of this type of legislation, would be the establishment of more individualized bins which would clearly contain only one product and which would through a central post or whatever, have a clearly marked single price for all of the commodities within that bin. That would be physically separate and apart from an adjoining bin that would have a competitive product with the price posted and perhaps the size of the canned goods or whatever that are in that bin. They would then be easily ascertainable to the purchaser to do comparative shopping without the confusion that presently exists with all the competitive products crammed together on one shelf and with the pricing labels between shelves confusing the public as to whether they relate to the goods below or above.

That is a possibility that I'm sure the chain stores are examining. I agree with the member that we don't want to discourage improvement in efficiency in their operations so long as it doesn't prejudice the consumer.

The other consideration that might eventually lead to such legislation becoming redundant would be something further into the future and is one which, I gather, has been delved into on an experimental basis in the United States. I think it was down in one of the eastern seaboard states. It received a great deal of publicity a year or two ago. That is the fact that supermarket purchasing may eventually reach the point where it will all be done by a closed-circuit television. The person would not even need to go physically to the local store to make the purchase but would simply be able to make the purchase through a shoppers' list made available throughout the community in the proximity of the market place.

One could simply through the pushing of buttons place an order through the closed-circuit television process. The order would be made up immediately and automatically in the store, bundled and sent out to the near proximity of the store and picked up by the customer without ever entering the store or it might even be delivered to the purchaser's home.

That of course is somewhat futuristic but it's being experimented with now, and in that way may more greatly justify the use of the Universal Product Code system and in that situation of course there would be no need for the unit pricing requirement there is today. But as I say, Mr. Speaker, that particular observation is related to something obviously some distance in the future.

The other option that I refer to is something that's more readily obtainable and perhaps something that's in the immediate future, whether in fact it's—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Williams: —it's something that the supermarket chains themselves have to resolve in their own minds, but in the meantime, Mr. Speaker, there is justification for giving support to this legislation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Niagara Falls.

Mr. Kerrio: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would like to inform the member that he has until 4:58.

Mr. Kerrio: Until 4:58? You are on the computer as well, are you, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Correct.

Mr. Kerrio: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

The member for Oriole made mention that it's usual that any bills put forth by my fellow member for Windsor-Walkerville are usually well advised and make a lot of sense. I have to think that in this particular instance it's a bill that makes a great deal of sense, particularly to those people who are confronted with the possibility of shopping in the future without prices being printed on the products.

I am very pleased to hear the kind of reception that's been given the bill on all sides. I think it's particularly timely when the price of foods are increasing at the rate that they are, that those people who would avail themselves of the savings by spending a little more time shopping will be able to be guided by the sort of bill we are debating here today. That is, having all individual articles priced except possibly for those items that are very difficult to price or need not be priced, such as the soft containers of milk or things that could have the prices posted.

I think a very significant thing among shoppers is the ability to comparison shop. To have printed-out receipts with all of the articles marked so that one can compare them is the only possible way that consumers, if they are willing to take the time to study those articles that are reduced somewhat as loss leaders to encourage people to go and buy, can save. I would certainly agree with the large supermarkets that, in the overall picture, they have to make the whole operation pay. I think it's considered quite acceptable that some articles could be marked very low and very possibly as loss leaders to encourage people to come and buy at those supermarkets. I can't believe that those people who take advantage of those lower priced items from store to store wouldn't be able, at this time when prices are so high in the food industry, to save themselves money by being able to comparison shop.

It's usually good advice to study in other jurisdictions legislation that we might be putting into place in order for us to do a little comparison with what happens in those areas. I have before me some reports in various other jurisdictions. There are not so many in Canada; I guess because Canada is rather in its infancy in universal product coding. It was thought in some areas this was going to catch on like wildfire. Such has not been the case because it seems very difficult, particularly in our jurisdiction, where we see these huge chain stores vying for the average shopper's business and talking about not putting brand labels on all cans as they relate to certain products. If they are going to encourage people to shop, certainly they can't do it if they are going to eliminate pricing on the individual article.

As far as the system is concerned, there is a substantial amount of saving, as the member for Windsor-Walkerville pointed out, in the ability of the large stores to maintain very accurate records of their stock, of their sales, and to have very small losses as they relate to mistakes in prices being read as opposed to the printout on the universal price code. But I am sure that as a service to the public most of them would be willing, in face of the substantial savings being made, to pay back some small portion of the saving by conveniently marking all items.

As I suggested before, the universal pricing code has not caught on. I think the large chain stores themselves have read the resistance of the buying public to making purchases without being able to do proper comparative shopping. With individual price labels, one is able to remember the cost of items for purposes of comparison. One of our former ministers, as was pointed out before, suggested that if we went to the universal pricing code we could carry along a pencil and mark things as we went and thereby have our own marking system.

I am pleased to see that in most jurisdictions where scanners have been put in, legislation has been passed for stores to retain individual pricing. Such has been the case in many US states. If we see fit to support Bill 100 that is before us, to take a very responsible position that would convenience people who avail themselves of reasonable comparisons in their shopping day so that they can cut the costs of providing food for their families, we will be performing, I think, a very valuable service.

It goes without saying, then, that individual price posting could very well go along with universal product coding; by providing both to the citizens of Ontario we will be providing them with a very valuable ability to do proper comparison shopping.

Mr. Acting Speaker: There are several minutes left for this debate. The member for Beaches-Woodbine, for about two minutes.

Ms. Bryden: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to support this bill, but I am somewhat disappointed that we haven't had this kind of legislation two or three years ago when the universal pricing code was first introduced on products in the market place. It seems to me that was the time we should have had some indication from the government they were concerned about protecting consumers with the introduction of this new legislation.

Particularly, we should remember that the consumer is the most beleaguered person in our society today. He faces constant increases in prices with a current inflation rate of nine per cent. He has little control over the choice of goods offered on the shelves, and the recent hearings before the resources development committee indicated that his choice may be affected by the willingness of producers to pay kickbacks or accept discounted prices. Therefore, the consumer has to shop very carefully and must have the opportunity for comparison shopping. This is particularly important for senior citizens whose meagre pensions do not keep up with the rate of inflation, and even for others who are restricted to wage increases of six per cent under the Anti-Inflation Board, while food prices went up 3.3 per cent in the last month alone.

[5:00]

The consumer's voice is unfortunately very weak, and it is the government's responsibility to see that his interests are safeguarded in the market. But the government appears only to hear the voice of the supermarkets; its boasts about consumer protection program become hypocritical cant when one views the inaction to date in this field.

I hope that the member for Oriole will persuade his colleagues to support this bill and to see that it goes through to third reading, because it is long overdue.

Mr. Acting Speaker: The time for debate on this bill has expired.

LABOUR RELATIONS AMENDMENT ACT

Mr. Ziemba moved second reading of Bill 107, An Act to amend the Labour Relations Act.

Mr. Acting Speaker: The member for High Park-Swansea for up to 20 minutes.

Mr. Ziemba: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to reserve 10 minutes, more or less, to wrap at the end of this debate.

I am pleased to introduce Bill 107, An Act to amend the Labour Relations Act. This bill will provide a first collective agreement when a bargaining unit has been certified but when negotiations for a first agreement fail or one of the partners requests such action. For example, it would end the Fleck strike. In fact, if this legislation had been in place, the Fleck strike would not have gone this far. We could have saved the taxpayers more than $1 million in police costs, not to mention the untold human cost.

What we are talking about in this bill is whether an owner like Fleck will accept a union and a contract in a civilized way or whether workers must continue the politics of the street. Workers place their faith in the Ontario Labour Relations Board. Why wouldn't they? In the Fleck case, the board found that 87 per cent of the workers had joined the union; 117 out of 134. The bargaining unit was granted automatic certification. This should have been the end of the union's fight for recognition, but it was not so; it was only the beginning.

Not only at Fleck but more than 25 per cent of initial organization attempts never result in a first contract. In 1977-78, of 629 certifications 291 went to the ministry for conciliation and 161 of these were no-board decisions; in other words, they did not end up with a signed contract. This is not simply because of a lack of legislation. Some managements simply put their branch plants on wheels and move away to avoid unionization, and very often they receive government resettling grants in the bargain. Others hire expensive lawyers to frustrate certification and first agreements, and their high fees are written off as a business expense.

British Columbia enacted first-agreement legislation in 1974. The labour relations board chairman reports that there are about the same number of first contracts negotiated each year in BC as in Ontario but there have been only three requests in the past two years to have the first contract imposed by the BC board.

The prospect of imposed agreements acts as a deterrent to bad-faith bargaining, and this is the key to the legislation. The fact that it is there forces employers to bargain in good faith.

It is a disgrace that the anti-scab bill that was introduced here last week by my colleagues the members for Oshawa (Mr. Braugh) and the member for Bellwoods (Mr. McClellan) did not pass. Professional scabism is a weapon of anti-union management and the substructure of lawyers, union-busting consultants and so-called security organizations who thrive on this horrendous social confrontation of denying people the right to organize.

Last week the Minister of Labour lectured us on this anti-scab debate and stated that the anti-scab bill would fly in the face of the democratic principles upon which the Labour Relations Act is founded. What nonsense. She's been sitting over there, hatching the occupational health and safety bill for over a year. We're told now we might get it in the fall.

Mr. Lupusella: In a reasonable period of time.

Mr. Ziemba: Injured workers, their families and survivors were deliberately kept waiting three years for a deserved Workmen's Compensation Board increase. The money was in the fund all this time and she knew it. But she let them suffer.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, I did not.

Mr. Ziemba: You didn't know how much money you had in your fund?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I did not know that that money was available, no.

Mr. Ziemba: The Minister of Labour—

Mr. Lupusella: The report was not even necessary.

Mr. Ziemba: —seems to enjoy provoking confrontation, as she did with the Union of Injured Workmen.

Mr. Lupusella: You have been responsible.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I did not provoke any confrontation with anyone.

Mr. Lupusella: With your position, it is your responsibility.

Mr. Ziemba: First agreements are a great opportunity—

Mr. Lupusella: She has been responsible, and irresponsible in her actions.

Mr. Ziemba: First agreements are a great opportunity to establish the basic principle that employees in a work place should have the right and responsibility to determine their health and safety. The first agreement can also enshrine a meaningful standard grievance procedure giving all employees a right to a fair hearing, proper representation and arbitration.

BC, Quebec, and as of June 1, the federal government, have first agreement legislation. Although it is not perfect, it is an honest attempt to deal with an important injustice in our society. I hope that this assembly will have the concern and courage to deal favourably with this bill.

Mr. Acting Speaker: The member for High Park-Swansea has 14 minutes left. Does he wish to reserve all the time or just 10 minutes?

Mr. Ziemba: I would like to reserve that time.

Mr. Acting Speaker: The 14 minutes?

Mr. Ziemba: Yes.

Hon. B. Stephenson: As Minister of Labour, I am as concerned with the problem of successfully resolving first-contract disputes as is the member for High Park-Swansea. While I share his concern, I do not feel the solution which he proposes in Bill 107 will adequately deal with this problem. Therefore, I really cannot support the bill.

The bill proposes to empower the Minister of Labour—

Mr. Lupusella: What do you propose?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Just listen for a minute.

Mr. Turner: You might learn something.

Mr. Swart: I doubt it.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The bill proposes to empower the Minister of Labour with the authority to settle the terms and the conditions of first collective agreements upon the request of either party to the dispute.

This bill appears to have been inspired by legislation involving the same principle which has been adopted in British Columbia, in Quebec, and recently, by the federal government. While the principle is similar, there are several procedural differences between this bill and the legislation in those previously mentioned provinces. The procedure in this bill is the least desirable of the various legislative alternatives available. Under the BC labour code and the Canada labour code the Minister of Labour may refer a first-agreement dispute to the respective labour relations board. The labour relations board may determine the terms and conditions of the first agreement, giving consideration to whether the parties have bargained in good faith.

Under Quebec legislation, the Minister of Labour may submit the dispute to an arbitration council for settlement. The arbitration council can consider the absence or presence of good-faith bargaining by either party.

But Bill 107 involves the resolution of first-contract disputes by the Minister of Labour. It does not require a finding of a failure to bargain in good faith by either party as a precondition for the minister's involvement; nor does it direct the minister to consider the extent to which the parties have bargained in good faith. As a result, this bill involves a far greater interference with the collective bargaining process than does the legislation of either of the other provinces or the federal jurisdiction.

The enactment of this bill could undermine rather than strengthen the system of free collective bargaining which, I submit, is the cornerstone of our labour relations policy in this province. In Ontario we are attempting to deal with first-contract disputes through a process which attempts to strengthen—

Mr. Breaugh: How?

Mr. Mackenzie: Where and when?

Mr. Breaugh: Give us an example.

Hon. B. Stephenson: —the bargaining relationship between the parties, rather than to undermine it or pre-empt it.

Mr. Breaugh: Give us an example.

Mr. Mackenzie: That's exactly what you're doing. You're undermining it. You're spreading Fleck sickness in Ontario.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The Ontario mediation and conciliation service has developed an approach involving preventive mediation to reduce industrial conflict. Such an approach involves devoting particular attention to first-contract negotiations so that assistance can be offered when it appears that the parties are encountering some difficulty.

The preventive mediation initiative is relatively new. Therefore, it is really too early to evaluate its effectiveness statistically. However, the staff of the conciliation and mediation service have indicated that it truly does hold great potential for the fostering of better collective bargaining relationships. The experiences of the jurisdictions which have adopted first agreement arbitration is really inconclusive. The legislation is a relatively recent act in Quebec and for the federal government, but it has been in place in British Columbia since 1974.

As of the end of 1977, the Minister of Labour has referred 27 first contract disputes to the labour relations board. Of these 27, the board has imposed agreements in only eight cases.

Mr. Mackenzie: Do you know how many have reached agreement because of the legislation being there?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Of those eight cases, in only one instance were the parties able to negotiate a second agreement. In four of the eight cases the union's bargaining rights were terminated, while in two cases the imposed contract was still in effect. In the remaining case, no new agreement was signed, although there has been no termination of the union's bargaining rights.

These statistics, I will agree, may be open to interpretation, but it appears that the BC legislation has not been particularly successful—

Mr. Ziembra: What nonsense.

Hon. B. Stephenson: —in encouraging the development of sound bargaining relationships.

Mr. Breaugh: Compared to yours?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I have no reason to believe that the results of such a provision would be any more conclusive in that direction in this province. Therefore, I am not persuaded that we should adopt the principle introduced in Bill 107 at this time. The implementation of the provisions of Bill 107 would be inappropriate without thorough and thoughtful consideration of its implications for the industrial relations system in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Lupusella: You need another study to be sure about it.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I do believe that the experience in British Columbia, in Quebec and within the federal government merits serious study at the same time.

Mr. Breugh: Someone should lock you out.

Mr. Foulds: You make Mackenzie King look like a man of action.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I feel that the approach which has been taken in Ontario of preventive mediation has considerable potential for our industrial relations climate.

Mr. Grande: So you're going to study it for three years.

Mr. Lupusella: How can you repeat the same things all the time?

Mr. O'Neil: It is quite interesting to note that the Minister of Labour says that this type of legislation is not required at the present time.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I didn't say it wasn't required. I said it wasn't appropriate.

Mr. O'Neil: It wasn't appropriate at the present time. I just wonder why she would make a comment like this if she was so much against this legislation. As the member for Erie (Mr. Haggerty) just said to me a few minutes ago, the whole problem seems to be with the problems we are encountering within the Labour Relations Act itself. Possibly the minister should be thinking about having a committee of this Legislature set up to review the act to make those changes that are required in it. I think she herself agrees that there are many changes that are required.

Hon. B. Stephenson: We are reviewing it now.

Mr. O'Neil: The problem is when the minister is reviewing it now it doesn't really give the members of this party or the members of the third party the input that is required.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The opportunity is there.

Mr. Haggerty: It takes a private member's bill to get a review.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. O'Neil: As far as this party is concerned and I think the third party also, we would certainly like some input into those changes that are made in the Labour Relations Act so that we do have that input.

I suppose one of the reasons this bill appears before the Legislature as a private member's bill is the problem we have at Fleck. I can see why the member for High Park-Swansea (Mr. Ziemba) would be quite concerned, as I would believe all members of this Legislature are, that a strike of this type should go on for the amount of time it has. It shows some sort of a weakness in the system or in the Labour Relations Act when we haven't been able to bring it to a close and have at least some satisfaction from both the sides of labour and management. As I say, that's one of the reasons that this bill is before us now.

[5:15]

We see some advantages with the bill. I think we see that the threat of government involvement would act as a strong incentive for settlement. It might bring the parties to an agreement sooner. We see that it could possibly reduce the possibility of prolonging disputes, as in the Fleck case, as I have just mentioned. It could provide an effective remedy where a company refuses to bargain in good faith.

Mr. Foulds: As in the Port Arthur clinic strike.

Mr. O'Neil: That's another example that I suppose you could use also. Mind you, we do see some disadvantages with the bill.

An hon. member: Action is not your motto.

Mr. O'Neil: The minister has mentioned some of those. I think the members of the third party who are supporting this bill should look at it very carefully because I don't think it's the consensus of the labour movement across this province that they are totally in agreement with a bill of this sort at this time.

Mr. Breugh: Federation policy.

Mr. O'Neil: The federation has changed its mind a couple of times on this too. It hasn't always been along the same line that it would support it. There are even some members of the NDP who I feel sort of look at it a little bit.

Mr. Swart: Get it to committee.

Mr. O'Neil: The thing is that once you get government involved in a matter that should be restricted to management and labour, too much government control, you end up with further problems. I can see the unions might be the first to object to this. I wouldn't blame them one bit for having too much government involvement. I think this possibly is one of the things this bill is asking for.

Mr. Breugh: Those Fleck people think there is a little too much government involvement too.

Mr. O'Neill: Well, I mentioned Fleck. I can see, as I say, we are as worried about it as you are. We don't like to see it have gone on as long as it has.

This is one of the situations where I feel that if there were changes in the Labour Relations Act, we wouldn't have that problem. The thing is that when you throw these two together or they can't get together like this, and you ask the government to get in and fix it, it's like a shotgun marriage. We see other disadvantages—

Mr. Foulds: Some shotgun marriages turn out to be very happy.

Mr. Turner: Is that right?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Speaking from personal experience?

Mr. O'Neil: I can't speak from experience on this but maybe the member can. The Ontario labour relations legislation is based on the establishing of framework within which both parties, both management and labour, are then left free to establish their own relationship. Again, with government involvement, we would lose this.

Voluntary negotiation of contract is generally preferred by both parties. Both parties, particularly labour, have legitimate concerns when this policy has been departed from, sometimes for good reasons, as in the case of compulsory arbitration or the imposition of the anti-inflation program for another example.

This bill would permit the minister to settle the terms and conditions on the first collective agreement. A number of problems might arise. When should the minister decide to intervene? If she intervenes too quickly or too frequently, free collective bargaining would be destroyed. Just the notion that a settlement could ultimately be imposed might lead one or both parties away from a meaningful bargaining towards posturing. We know what the feeling is towards compulsory arbitration in some cases.

Another question is how should the minister intervene? What sorts of clauses and wage rates should be chosen? A pro-labour or pro-management minister can impose an agreement totally irrelevant to the economic strength and interest of the parties involved. Why should ministerial intervention be limited to the first collective agreement? What about subsequent agreements? Should the government have the power to intervene there as well? Again, I don't feel that it should. I don't think the majority of the members of this Legislature feel that either.

The minister has mentioned the example of British Columbia. It has had such legislation for some time but rarely continued on voluntary basis for a second agreement.

Mr. Kerrio: They also had a socialist government.

Mr. O'Neil: We currently have provisions in the Labour Relations Act to deal with employers who bargain in good faith. The remedy for a breach of that section may be inadequate. A more adequate remedy, perhaps substantial damages, might resolve the type of problem that the bill attempts to address without leading to the threat of ever-increasing government regulation which could benefit neither management nor labour.

As I mentioned in my preliminary remarks, we can see some of the reasoning behind the member for High Park-Swansea introducing this bill. It might be that some of the advantages and disadvantages that I have mentioned could be discussed if the bill were to go to committee. We will look forward to hearing further comments by the members.

Mr. Mackenzie: Mr. Speaker, I don't intend to spend a long time on this bill because I don't think it is necessary.

Mr. Haggerty: It is embarrassing, isn't it.

Mr. Mackenzie: I intend to support the bill, and I can assure the member to the right of Mitch Hepburn that the labour movement in Ontario is very happy to have this kind of bill before us at this time, and that is just about unanimous.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That isn't what I heard this morning.

Mr. Mackenzie: The minister is so right, just as she was right on the statements about BC. I think Paul Wyler told her where she stood, and that is that she was so wet behind the ears it wasn't even funny.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The facts speak for themselves.

Mr. Mackenzie: She also makes the comment about all of the attention she is giving the first agreements. It is a bit of a joke, because we have a problem in the province now, and it is a growing and spreading problem. That problem is basically good faith bargaining, which doesn't exist at this time unless you are awfully strong and awfully well-organized.

If you happen to have a small back-alley plant it is probably worse today than it was 10 or 15 years ago. I can tell the minister something about that, because I went through an organizing campaign myself, as an organizer, in back-alley sweatshops in Windsor. In a period of about eight months we organized nine of them—and there were some rough ones: the East Side Plating I can remember, Arcan Steel, a small Black and Decker tool and die plant, a whole number of them in that area. A year later we had three contracts.

We are lucky in some cases today in some of the industrial ghettos in Toronto if we have three contracts out of 10 organizing attempts a year later.

If you get a management, and especially if they have been coached by somebody like Stringer or some of the lawyers who make a damn good living at doing a job on the labour movement and on organizing drives and—

Hon. B. Stephenson: Don't look at me. I don't have anything to do with Stringer.

Mr. Mackenzie: —on the attempts to negotiate.

Well, you give them all kinds of leeway to operate—

Hon. B. Stephenson: Who gives them leeway to operate?

Mr. Mackenzie: —and you sure as heck let the strikebreakers operate, you let the police be used to add their weight against the workers such as you see at Fleck, and it becomes a bit of a joke. The scales are not balanced in this province. The scales are heavily weighted against workers in the labour movement. We are not having special attention to first agreements; we are not getting them.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Yes we are.

Mr. Mackenzie: She may be giving the attention—it has then become a joke. She is going to have as much credibility there as she had with injured workers for three years in this province.

The primary problem is one of anti-union managements. When one gets a time in society, and we get them occasionally, such as now, when one has a bit of a fear, and a bit of a swing, and the whole government program of restraint and cutbacks adds to it, people become afraid. Managements that don't like unions to begin with, take advantage of that kind of situation.

Hon. B. Stephenson: This is not a solution.

Mr. Mackenzie: That situation is one of the reasons we need a bill like this at this time.

Mr. Foulds: Let the minister give us a solution.

Mr. Mackenzie: Occasionally, the Labour Relations Act, or the Labour ministry, should be thinking in terms of assisting workers; most workers don't feel that is the case at any point in time.

Does the minister think I make a mistake on this? I have had, I guess, eight or nine letters in the last couple of weeks about situations. Let me read the most recent one that just arrived on my desk yesterday:

“Bob, can I ask you a favour? As you can see from the enclosed documents the union is having some difficulty at Alcan. There is one plant that is apparently the last one in the Alcan chain to be organized by any union anywhere in the country. It looks as if the Fleck illness”—this is a senior staff member of one of the unions writing to me—” is spreading. Perhaps you could ask the Minister of Labour whether she favours this kind of bargaining, and whether she intends to do anything about it.

“This is another example where the union organized practically everybody in the plant. More than 80 per cent of the hundred workers signed union cards, yet several months later the company is still opposed to clearcut union security or, indeed, union security in any form. This means the company still hopes one day to return to a world that never existed before the plant was organized. You can get additional information from the staff rep that we have servicing the local and attempting to reach a first contract. The name and phone number is given.”

The contract submitted—the basic first contract, and not as good as the general one that we have in the Alcan chain across this province—has some 60 or 70 clauses in it. The company early in the game agreed to about 10 of them; most of them don't mean very much. They are standard clauses in that contract, and from that point on their attitude and in particular where it comes to union security or any kind of checkoff their attitude is: that is the bottom line; we don't intend to negotiate these matters with you; we have given you what we are going to give you.

Where do we go from here? We have been months stymied in that situation. We have been months in the Fleck situation. We have gone through the situation at the Brampton Daily Times over modified union security. We have it time and time again, and the staff reps tell me it is growing around this province.

What are we going to do about that kind of a situation? There is no help from the Ministry of Labour in these situations. We just can't get any action. The minister doesn't want to interfere. I personally don't particularly like interference in the collective bargaining process either. But when one gets a position where one has that kind of very strong—I call it right-wing attitude—in your community, and where one has a decision made that, by God, we are going to hold the wages, we are going to set these unions back, they are the culprits, they are easy to blame right now and some of the government actions add to that kind of an anti-union sentiment—

Hon. B. Stephenson: What?

Mr. Mackenzie: Yes, some of the government actions do. When one gets that kind of attitude abroad in the community it encourages those managements, those companies that don't want the union in the first place, to take this kind of attitude.

Hon. B. Stephenson: What government actions?

Mr. Foulds: You promised action two years ago and you have done nothing. What kind of assistance?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I didn't promise. I said we would look to see. The review is under way.

Mr. Foulds: You have done nothing.

Mr. Mackenzie: I am simply asking the minister what kind of protection or what kind of assistance do we give? The fact is, in terms of that legislation now being tried in Quebec, and in particular the BC legislation, it has had some effect.

Hon. B. Stephenson: As a deterrent effect, yes.

Mr. Mackenzie: Not in the three or four or eight cases that the minister is talking about but, as I think Professor Wyler, the chairman of the board, pointed out very clearly, about 1,000 first contracts are negotiated each year in his province, approximately the same number of new bargaining units certified in Ontario annually. There have been only three requests in the past two years to have a first contract imposed by the BC board. That shows how minimal the problem has become. I took the trouble to phone out there the other day and talked to Ron Douglas, one of the staff reps who does a lot of negotiating with new, small plants in the Vancouver area and the lower BC mainland.

The fact that two or three of the earlier decisions, where there was clearly a case of an anti-union company or anti-union management resisting an attempt to get a first contract with the union, where the first contract was imposed and where that contract more or less met the standards for that particular kind of an operation in that area, the shock waves went out through the entire industrial community.

You didn't necessarily get the same thing from then on. Rather than risk going to that first agreement, they seriously negotiated. Because they value their ability to be independent and to do their own negotiating in the trade union movement, that was an assist that meant we really didn't have to resort to that legislation. That is the kind of effect that legislation has had in BC.

It is not the particular clauses and whether it is the best written bill here or not; it is the fact that we don't see the Labour minister in this province, or the Ministry of Labour, moving to offer this kind of assistance to working people, where you have a clearcut attack on organized working people in this province today. That is what worries me—the fact that rather than assist, you would seem to ride that kind of bandwagon. That worries me considerably.

For that reason I think this bill is a good step. If the minister is not prepared to accept this, then she should be bringing in a bill with some teeth in it that does give us something with which we can say to management like Fleck, and I don't know of many worse—or some of these others, Alcan and the current attitude they have there, and the attitude the Thomson chain had at the Brampton Daily Times—that is going to be able to say to them, "Look, you are going to have to bargain seriously; that is the name of the game. That means you are going to win some and lose some of the points you are asking for across the bargaining table, but at least you are going to sit down and honestly bargain."

That is not going on, particularly in new plants, and even in some of the old plants, with fairly well-established unions. For the first time we are seeing companies coming in and saying, "You may have had this for five or 10 years as something you fought to gain, but you don't necessarily hold it in this round of bargaining."

That even goes to an attempt to roll back union security clauses. We have had two plants within the past couple of weeks going into negotiations in Hamilton where they have had union security clauses for years and the company has attempted to open that up again on the bargaining table.

When that happens, you are asking for a confrontation and real problems over the next year or two in this province. I am suggesting to the minister, and I say it with some unease and even some fear, and I mean that seriously, that she is asking for some real trouble in the labour relations field in the next couple of years. She should be taking a good look at this kind of legislation.

Mr. Lupusella: When is the minister going to learn?

Mr. Acting Speaker: The honourable member for Peterborough—you have seven minutes.

Mr. Turner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Kerrio: Six now.

Mr. Turner: Thanks, Vince. As a member for a riding—

Mr. Breaugh: That's enough.

[5:30]

Mr. Turner: As a member from a riding in which there is a strong union representation within the industrial base, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate. In my view, Bill 107 is an interesting proposal but I am not convinced that the amendments to the Labour Relations Act put forward by the member for High Park-Swansea are the most effective way of assuring that a first collective agreement will be reached between a trade union and an employer.

Mr. Deans: What do you recommend?

Mr. Turner: Just listen for a while.

Mr. Deans: I am trying. Get to the point.

Mr. Turner: I can understand and appreciate the member's desire to find a suitable mechanism through which a duly certified union can achieve its first agreement with management. I do not believe that the collective bargaining process would be enhanced by establishing through legislation, or government interference of any kind actually, a procedure that would automatically involve the minister in a dispute upon the request of one party or the other.

The minister has already stated the intent of the proposed bill does bear a similarity to existing legislation in British Columbia, Quebec and within the federal jurisdiction. In each of these jurisdictions the minister may refer a dispute to an arbitration agency, which in turn is empowered to consider the extent to which the parties have bargained in good faith. None of these jurisdictions involves the minister directly in resolving the dispute.

With respect to the present Minister of Labour, it is not an area in which I believe the minister should be involved. In British Columbia, as an example, the role of the Minister of Labour under the Labour Code of British Columbia is directed to strikes that are against the public interest. Relying on the prestige of his office and the advice of his staff, the minister may play a significant role in resolving public interest disputes. But it should be emphasized that the role is not one of a mediator providing binding arbitration. Rather, the role of the minister in public interest disputes is to introduce mediation into a dispute that has not had the benefit of that service.

Also, I would like to point out that mediation is a voluntary service in British Columbia. If neither party wants mediation, then the right to strike is not barred. If the minister, however, deems it to be in the public interest, he can appoint a mediation officer. Such situations may arise when neither party wants to show weakness and is asking for mediation, or when there is a massive disruption of public service. When a mediation officer is appointed, a statutory strike bar comes into effect.

Mr. Deans: John, what do you recommend? Don't give me the history of it; tell me what you recommend.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Turner: Just listen and we'll get some background.

Mr. Deans: You've only got three more minutes. What do you recommend?

Mr. Turner: A statutory strike bar comes into effect, as I said, Mr. Speaker, until the mediator reports to the minister.

Mr. Deans: You have only got two and a half minutes now. What do you recommend?

Mr. Samis: Throw the speech away, John.

Mr. Turner: The period in which the mediator's appointment remains in effect may be extended at the discretion of the minister, thereby extending the strike bar.

Mr. Deans: Fine. Now, what do you recommend?

Mr. Acting Speaker: Will the member for Wentworth cease interjecting?

Mr. Deans: I doubt it. But I'll try.

Mr. Turner: This practice, however, has been used with restraint. I would like to point out that in 1974 there were 17 referrals to a mediator by the minister, in 1975 there were nine, there were none in 1976, and in 1977 there was but one.

An hon. member: That doesn't mean a thing.

Mr. Deans: That's good. We are delighted that's the situation.

Mr. Turner: I'm glad to hear it, because I think that is the whole gist of it.

Mr. Deans: Now, what do you recommend?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Why don't you just shut up?

Mr. Turner: If I read this bill properly, there appears to be no provision to determine whether the parties have indeed been bargaining in good faith. It simply states that after a given period of time the minister may intervene at the request of either party.

Mr. Mackenzie: It's the hardest thing in the world to prove. You should know that.

They just have to make one offer and they are bargaining in good faith.

Mr. Turner: In my view, this will have three effects. First, it introduces an element of compulsion into the collective bargaining process, and I believe that is wrong.

Mr. Deans: Now we know what you don't want, what do you want?

Mr. Turner: Second, it may provide a disincentive on the part of one party or the other to resolve their dispute without arbitration. Third, and perhaps most important, it will not ultimately guarantee the strength of the union as a bargaining unit for the employees.

Mr. Deans: You've only got two minutes.

Mr. Turner: I would like to deal with that latter point first, because it is often argued that one method of assuring union recognition in a case where an employer refuses to recognize a trade union is by imposing a first agreement upon the two parties involved. It seems to me, however, that there are two principles involved here. The first, of course, is the question of the freedom of contract. The second is the question, does it really solve the problem?

Mr. Deans: Now that we know what you are opposed to, what are you for?

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Deans: You have only got a minute and a half.

Hon. B. Stephenson: He's not going to have any time left if you don't shut up.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Would the member for Wentworth please cease interjecting and allow the member for Peterborough to continue?

Mr. Makarchuk: If he's not for very much, he's got enough time to tell us.

Mr. Turner: As I said, this bill would indeed introduce an element of compulsion into the bargaining process and this would manifest itself in that section of the bill which states that the arbitration resulting from the involvement of the minister would be binding on both parties. In cases where the arbitration is not satisfactory to one party or the other, it would mean there would be renewed difficulties upon negotiating a second contract. In effect, as the British Columbia experience would indicate, the provisions put forward in this bill would not appear to be a guarantee of union stability—

Mr. Makarchuk: They say, "Take it or we will move out of town." What kind of condition is that?

Mr. Turner:—once a first contract has been negotiated. Moreover, it involves the Minister of Labour directly in the bargaining process and extends the ministerial role beyond any other legislation of this nature in other jurisdictions of the country.

Mr. M. Davidson: That's our next bill, John.

Mr. Turner: In other words, it extends the role of the minister beyond that of protecting the public interest. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I, unfortunately cannot support this bill.

Mr. Deans: You said when you started you would let me know what you were for. What are you for?

Mr. Turner: You interrupted me so much that I cut it out. I will be pleased to talk to you.

Mr. Mackenzie: You don't even have a suggestion.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order, order.

An hon. member: Allan Pope did the same thing last week. He couldn't read his speech either.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order. The member for High Park-Swansea has reserved 14 minutes. Does he wish to use that time?

Mr. Ziemba: I would like to yield part of my time, Mr. Speaker, to Mr. Breagh.

Mr. Acting Speaker: I am sorry. If you do not wish to use your time, I will take the next speaker on the list. Time is not transferable.

Mr. Ziemba: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order. Other members have not used the total time. The honourable minister didn't, the member for Quinte didn't and they are not transferable.

Mr. Ziemba: On a point of order: I reserved time at the end of the debate, not halfway through the debate.

Mr. Kerrio: You haven't been here long enough.

Mr. Acting Speaker: I would point out to the member for High Park-Swansea you have, if you wish to use it, the balance of the time in this debate. If you do not wish to use it, I will take the next speaker on the list. Do you wish to use the time?

Mr. M. Davidson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; I am asking you if you are saying to the member for High Park-Swansea that he has 14 minutes before time has expired on the debate of this bill.

Mr. Acting Speaker: That is correct.

Mr. Turner: He has 12 now.

Mr. M. Davidson: Last week, I don't know whether you were in the chair or not, sir, but the member for Bellwoods deferred his eight minutes in my favour. He was allowed to do so by the Speaker and I spoke on the bill.

Mr. Kerrio: It was a mistake.

Mr. M. Davidson: Now a precedent has already been set in participating in the debate.

Mr. Turner: Two wrongs don't make a right.

Mr. M. Davidson: It has been recognized by the Speaker of this Legislative Assembly that the final speaker can, in fact, defer his remaining time to another member of his own caucus. I would urge you, sir, before you make the decision, to check Hansard and check with the person in the chair at that time.

Mr. Acting Speaker: The floor now belongs to the member for High Park-Swansea, if he wishes to use the time. If he doesn't need the whole time, we will then decide who is the next speaker. Does he wish to take the floor now?

Mr. M. Davidson: No, no.

Mr. Ziembra: Mr. Speaker, I have reserved the balance of my time for the end of this debate.

Mr. Turner: Which you would use.

Mr. Ziembra: Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on this point of order.

Mr. Acting Speaker: The member for High Park-Swansea reserved 14 minutes for himself. He has 20 minutes. It is the practice of this House, if a member does not use his entire time, we move to the next speaker. The time is divided by persons.

Mr. Ziembra: There are only 14 minutes in this debate, is that what you are saying, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Acting Speaker: Yes. There are now 12 minutes in the debate. It is your time.

Mr. Ziembra: Fine. I am yielding that 12 minutes to Mr. Breaugh.

Mr. Acting Speaker: I am sorry. The next speaker on the list is—

Mr. Ziembra: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Acting Speaker: Yes, I am the Speaker.

Mr. Ziembra: —it was agreed to last week at this time by the Speaker at that time.

An hon. member: It was done on my bill too.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Is the member for High Park-Swansea—

Mr. Ziembra: I am going to challenge the ruling of the chair, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Does the member for High Park-Swansea wish to speak at this time?

Mr. Ziembra: I challenge the ruling of the chair.

Mr. Acting Speaker: I have asked you, do you wish to speak at this time?

Mr. Ziembra: I challenge the ruling of the chair, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Fine, fine. The chair has ruled that the member for High Park-Swansea has the floor. If he does not wish to speak, the floor will revert to the member for Essex South (Mr. Mancini). The member for High Park-Swansea has challenged my ruling.

Mr. Foulds: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker: I would ask if you could, having made that decision, cite any of the rules in the standing orders, particularly under section 35 in the—what is it called?—italic type at the beginning in the provisional orders which indicates any support. I would also suggest that where there are no clearcut standing orders, provisional or otherwise, precedent is what governs the procedures in the House. I would earnestly suggest that the precedent that has been established last week when the member for Bellwoods ceded his remaining time to another colleague is the practice of the House.

I draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that there won't be many precedents in that the rules are provisional and have not been in effect for very long. I would very much recommend to your considered and wise judgement the precedent that was established last Thursday.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Does the member for Cambridge wish to speak on the point of order? I would remind the members that they are using up time that may be used for speaking.

Mr. M. Davidson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker: I quote from Hansard of Thursday afternoon, June 15 where the Speaker said: "The member for Bellwoods has reserved eight minutes. That means there is only one minute left for any other member. Does the member for Bellwoods intend using the full eight minutes?" The member for Bellwoods responded: "I intend to yield my eight minutes to the member for Cambridge. If another member wishes to use up the minute, feel free." The member for St. Catharines (Mr. Bradley) declined the one minute he was allowed. I proceeded to stand up and speak and the Speaker allowed me to do so.

Mr. Acting Speaker: The member for High Park-Swansea has indicated that he does not want to speak at this time. I have indicated as Speaker that if he does not wish to speak, I will take the next speaker, who is the member for Essex South. The member for High Park-Swansea has challenged my ruling.

Mr. Nixon: I wonder, Mr. Speaker, since your ruling has been upheld whether you might have the breadth of judgement in this connection to indicate that the procedural affairs committee might look into some of the minutiae and ramifications of these rules. I would suggest you might take that matter under advisement.

Mr. Acting Speaker: The Speaker will take the matter under advisement.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON NOTICE PAPER

TENANT PROTECTION

99. Mr. J. Duksza (Parkdale): Will the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations (Mr. Grossman) table all submissions made to him by government ministries or agencies pursuant to his requests for submissions on the green paper on tenant protection and condominiums? [Table June 7, 1978.]

See sessional paper 157.

OPP OVERTIME

101. Mr. R. Mackenzie (Hamilton East): Would the Solicitor General please provide the following information: 1. the number of hours and cost of overtime for the OPP for the months of January, February, March, April, May, 1978; 2. the number of hours and the cost of overtime for the months of March, April and May, 1977. [Tabled June 8, 1978.]

Hon. G. A. Kerr (Solicitor General): The hours and cost of Ontario Provincial Police overtime are:

	*Actual Hours	Amount $
1977 March	25,995	325,088
April	24,746	298,709
May	32,883	436,422
1978 January	22,744	300,631
February	19,645	259,307
March	29,718	387,911
April	39,716	566,374
May	34,344	474,169

*The hours shown are the actual hours. The memorandum of understanding with the Ontario Provincial Police Association calls for actual hours to be multiplied by one and a half and paid for at the regular rates.

PASTORIA HOLDINGS LIMITED

102. Mr. R. McClellan (Bellwoods): Will the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations indicate how many complaints were received by the HUDAC new home warranty program since its inception against Pastoria Holdings Limited and its related companies? What is the nature and substance of each of these complaints? What was the disposition of each of these complaints? [Tabled June 9, 1978.]

Hon. L. Grossman (Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations): The HUDAC new home warranty program is the non-profit corporation designed to administer the Ontario New Home Warranties Plan Act. This act, which represents a major initiative in the direction of industry self regulation, protects the purchasers of all new homes bought since January 1, 1976.

The warranty corporation is responsible for its own daily operation and policies within the framework of the governing legislation. As minister I do not second guess its administrative decisions but rather monitor its overall operation to ensure that it administers the plan fairly and with full regard to the consumer interest.

However, as a courtesy to the member for Bellwoods I can advise in response to his question that 52 complaints have been received by the warranty corporation since its inception against Pastoria Holdings Limited and its related companies. The complaints relate to a wide variety of matters.

Thirty-three of these complaints have been resolved. Of the 19 unresolved complaints 13 are of very recent origin (none earlier than May) and the remaining six are in conciliation. I am advised that a consumer service department has been established and that complaints have generally been dealt with on a current basis.

GWA EMPLOYABLE CASE LOAD

108. Mr. McClellan: Would the Minister of Community and Social Services table the 1978 and the 1979 forecast of the general welfare assistance employable case load for the province of Ontario? [Tabled June 14, 1978.]

Hon. K. Norton (Minister of Community and Social Services): The following information from the ministry's 1978-79 program and resources summary (page 55) provides the answer to question 108 on Order Paper 74, tabled by Mr. McClellan, June 14, 1978:

EMPLOYABLE CASE LOAD

	1976-77 Actual	1977-78 Estimated	1978-79 Forecast
Total cases	21,187	23,141	26,792
Dependents	24,320	28,559	27,008
Total beneficiaries	45,507	51,700	53,800

DOW CHEMICAL

100. Mr. R. F. Nixon (Brant-Oxford-Norfolk): What were the costs of the legal action undertaken by the government against Dow Chemical in regard to mercury pollution? [Tabled June 8, 1978.]

103. Ms. M. Bryden (Beaches-Woodbine): With regard to the government's lawsuit against the Dow Chemical Company, will the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry) table the following information on costs related to the lawsuit for each fiscal year since the inception of the suit to date: (a) names and addresses of each lawyer and/or law firm receiving payments, and amount of payment to each; (b) names and addresses of consultants and technical personnel and/or consulting and engineering firms receiving payments, and amount of payment to each; (c) other disbursements (specify recipient's name and address and amount if amount is over $100 per fiscal year); (d) estimated cost of time spent on the lawsuit or in preparation for it by personnel employed by the government? In addition, will the Attorney General table the following: (e) copies of legal and technical opinions received by the Attorney General prior to inception of the lawsuit advising him on the prospects for a successful action against the company; (f) names and addresses of persons and/or firms receiving payments for the opinions referred to in (e) and the amounts paid to each person and/or firm? [Tabled June 13, 1978.]

LEGISLATURE OF ONTARIO

THURSDAY, JUNE 22, 1978

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION AMENDMENT ACT

Resumption of the adjourned debate on the motion for second reading of Bill 126, An Act to amend the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Mr. McClellan: Mr. Speaker. I don't intend to take more than five minutes to conclude my remarks on the second reading debate.

I had a few short points that I had begun to make, some of which arise out of a tentative understanding of some of the conclusions of the Wyatt report, which I will need to study a lot more, as all of us will.

The first of these is that the workmen's compensation program must be maintained as an insurance program and it must not be allowed to become a welfare program. It must not be financed out of general revenue. It must be financed out of an adequate assessment.

I have a concern that the increases that are being granted in this bill, hopefully today, or as late as tomorrow, are being financed simply by running up the liability in the accident fund even higher. If that practice continues, it threatens the insurance nature of the workmen's compensation program. Sooner or later that money will be gone and then you will have no choice but to turn to general revenue. I don't think any of us in this House want the fund to move away from the insurance principle.

The second point I want to touch on briefly, even just allude to, is a very distressing reference in the Wyatt report regarding the matter of the relationship between work incentive and benefit levels. I want to say very clearly to the minister again, this is not a welfare program, this is an insurance program, and she should not try to set the rates at punitive levels.

I do not believe that the compensation board benefits are anywhere close to a level where one can say that there is a disincentive to work. That is not my experience, on the basis of having dealt with many hundreds of workmen's compensation cases since I was elected here. The people that I deal with want to work. They want to get off compensation. They want to get back into a job, whether it's their old job or a new job which they can do, even in the light of the disability. I don't believe that there is any ground at all for raising the bogeyman of disincentive.

The third issue I want to touch upon very briefly is simply the issue of work for injured workers. That is still a program area in compensation in this province that is inadequately dealt with. I speak as one representing a constituency, by and large, of construction workers who, when they experience a disability, become totally destroyed from the possibility of returning to their occupation. We are going to have to face up to the fact that our existing work placement and work rehabilitation programs are inadequate in this province and that we need to start moving quickly into a serious program, which includes both affirmative action and job creation and, I believe, the establishment through statutory right in legislation of a statutory guarantee that injured workers will be found a place in this economy.

The final point I want to make very simply is that in the long run the workmen's compensation program will have to be replaced by a program of universal accident and illness insurance. This is not a matter that relates solely to workmen's compensation. If the minister will talk to the Minister of Community and Social Services (Mr. Norton), she will learn that something in the order of 40 per cent of the people who are on social assistance in this province are there by virtue of an incapacity to work due to sickness or disability.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Some of it is congenital disability.

Mr. McClellan: No. The minister is wrong. I invite her to look at a study of Ontario's social assistance recipients that was done, I think about a year ago, by the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto with the co-operation of the ministry. It's a good study and a simple descriptive study. It tells who is on social assistance and why they are there. It would be illuminating for her.

I think that logic, if nothing else, will move us, I hope not too slowly, in the direction of the provision of a universal accident and illness insurance program which will serve to rationalize the present hodge-podge of income security programs which now cover those who are dependent by virtue of sickness, accident, illness or disability in a partial and inadequate way.

We heard the other day again from the Minister of Community and Social Services in response to a question about the substantial number of injured workers who are receiving both permanent and partial disability allowances from the pensions from the Workmen's Compensation Board and social assistance allowances from the Ministry of Community and Social Services. I would guess as well that the majority of them would be receiving allowances through the Canada Pension disability program. All of these programs together add up to inadequate benefit levels.

To conclude, simply and for the sake of brevity, I think that the needs of our citizens who suffer by virtue of a condition of dependency caused by sickness, accident, illness or disability will only be addressed when there is one single universal program to replace the hodge-podge of programs that serve them so badly today.

Mr. Laughren: I agree with that.

Mr. McClellan: Instead of engaging in a fruitless ideological dispute on this issue, I hope that the minister will simply look at the problem, try to assess it and try to develop a solution to the problem.

Mr. Laughren: It's obvious that there is going to be general support for this bill. My colleague from Windsor-Sandwich outlined the position of this party extremely well in some detail concerning the principles of the bill, and it is one that certainly none of us would disagree with.

Primarily we support the increases. We are concerned about three or four areas of the bill, and we very much hope that the minister will accept the amendments in the spirit of minority government. We very much hope that the Liberal Party would view it the same way. We are disturbed because of the minister's reaction to the will of minority government concerning Bill 70; quite frankly that bothers us a great deal, that despite the wishes of minority government as expressed in the amendment that came out of that committee, the minister's unwillingness to proceed with that bill as it was amended indicates an attitude towards the will of minority government that is not becoming to her as a minister of the crown.

On this particular bill, we are worried about the ceilings that have been established and the small increase of eight per cent or so that raised the ceiling from $15,000 to $16,200 on which compensation benefits are computed. We are worried about the spouse's benefits. We don't think that $365 is appropriate, if you think for a moment what that means. Certainly in the Sudbury area we have had ample opportunity to think about what it means to a spouse, and in the Sudbury area with the mining it is invariably the woman who is left to raise a family when the husband is killed in the mine. The husband might have been earning anywhere from $14,000 to $20,000 a year, depending on what his job was in the mine and to what extent he was into the bonus mining operations.

To say to someone like that that, "You are going to now live, at the present level, on around $4,000 a year," we think that's just a bit much; $365 a month is simply not enough. That should be and could be raised. As the Wyatt report points out, the board is not bankrupt and they should proceed to pay the levels that are just.

The third major problem is the whole question of how we ensure that the same thing that happened in the last three years does not happen again. It is simply not right that workers would wait three years to have an increase in the level of benefits. I know the benefits are retroactive; that is as it should be. On the other hand, there are people who during those three years should not have been subjected to the level of benefits they were receiving.

At some point the government is going to have to deal with the principle of workmen's compensation—the whole question of how it is that we in this society expect people to work. We eulogize the work ethic; we encourage the work ethic; we say to people that it is right to work, and we all benefit because of the labour of people. Then, when they become injured in the pursuit of their careers or of their jobs underground or on construction, wherever it might be, we penalize them in a financial way.

At some point we have to say, "That is simply not right. It is not right to expect people to do dangerous work." The level of income is not important when we are talking about the principle of compensation. When people work, they should not be expected to be penalized in a financial way if they get injured because of their work.

It is difficult for me to understand how a government so committed to the whole free enterprise concept can substantiate their position over the years on workers' compensation. That's something that the Wyatt report does not seem to understand.

[8:15]

As a matter of fact, the Wyatt report bothered me a great deal.

I would hope that at some point we will have a wide-ranging and comprehensive debate on the Wyatt report. I would hope, when we come back in the fall session, the minister will have a comprehensive statement on the views expressed in the Wyatt report, and what the intentions are of this government in implementing some of those recommendations. I think we need that.

The minister would be the first to agree, I suspect, that there's a lot of feeling out there in the community about workers' compensation. One of my colleagues—I think it was the member for Bellwoods—talked about the violence that occurs occasionally. It happens from year to year. It doesn't happen in any other area or jurisdiction in the province of Ontario, except to people who are subjected to inadequate levels of income under workers' compensation.

At some point we shall have to deal with this, and the government will have to take a look at the situation and say, "What is it that we are doing so wrong? Why do we have the Union of Injured Workmen? Why do we have the Injured Workers' Consultants? Why is it that MPPs who live in industrialized areas, whose offices are in industrialized areas, are besieged by workers' compensation problems?"

I was in my constituency office not too long ago when an officer from the Workmen's Compensation Board in Sudbury phoned and wanted to know what percentage of my constituency office assistant's time was spent on workers' compensation problems. I expected a response of 50 to 60 per cent. Her response was 90 per cent. This is not an exaggeration. I see a couple of the members opposite looking as though they don't believe this.

Mr. Hodgson: I didn't say I didn't believe you. What else do you have to do up there?

Mr. Laughren: You might ask yourself who is responsible for that, too. Who is responsible for the fact that we don't have that kind—

Mr. Hodgson: You have wanted to close down Inco for years.

Mr. Laughren: Who wants to close down Inco?

Mr. Hodgson: You guys.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the honourable member could return to the content of the bill?

Mr. Hodgson: The member for Sudbury East (Mr. Martel) has been yacking here for years.

Mr. Laughren: I will try, Mr. Speaker, but the member for York North is deliberately misleading this chamber when he says the member for Sudbury East has been trying to close down the mining industry in Sudbury.

Mr. Hodgson: He has not.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the honourable member withdraw that?

Mr. Laughren: I will withdraw the remark if the member for York North will withdraw his remark.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the member for Nickel Belt withdraw?

Mr. Laughren: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether you heard the remarks of the member for York North?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the honourable member withdraw the remark?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Misleading the House.

Mr. Hodgson: Misleading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The honourable member used the term "deliberately misleading".

Mr. Laughren: Yes, I did.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the honourable member withdraw that?

Mr. Laughren: You put me in a very awkward position, because I deliberately heard the member for York North say that one of my colleagues had said we were trying to close down the mining industry in the Sudbury area. That is misleading this chamber.

Mr. Hodgson: I have been here a lot longer than you.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Will the honourable member withdraw?

Mr. Laughren: He was misleading.

Mr. Renwick: No. He will resign his seat and contest it in a by-election.

Mr. Eaton: Are you volunteering your seat?

Mr. Renwick: All right. We will test you on it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Will the member for Nickel Belt withdraw the words "deliberately misleading"?

Mr. Deans: What else do you say when that is what he did?

Mr. Eaton: He expressed the wrong information.

Mr. Deans: He didn't express the wrong information. He deliberately misled the House.

Mr. Renwick: We will fight him on that.

Mr. Laughren: Before I decide to withdraw or not withdraw, could I ask you for a ruling? Would you please—

Mr. Hennessy: Show some guts.

Mr. Laughren: Would you please tell me whether the member opposite can say something misleading and not have to withdraw it? Will you please give me a ruling on that?

Hon. Mrs. Birch: Shame on you!

Mr. Deans: It is not shame on him, it is shame on him.

Hon. Mrs. Birch: No, it is shame on him.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I appreciate the honourable member asking the chair a question. However, there was an interjection made, I believe, by an honourable member, and then the member who had the floor stated that that member had deliberately misled the House. That is what I heard, and I have asked the member to withdraw.

Mr. McClellan: It was accidental.

Mr. Yakabuski: Just say, "Yes, I withdraw."

Mr. Laughren: Could I say—

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: No, no you can't.

Mr. Laughren: You do put me in a difficult position. Could I, Mr. Speaker, withdraw the remark "deliberately misled" and say instead he deliberately misinformed the House? Thank you.

What I was trying to say was that the whole concept of compensation in this province continues to be a very serious problem. I understand why members who live in certain areas of Metropolitan Toronto might not understand the seriousness of the problem. They do not understand the problem of an injured worker and all that it means when that worker gets injured and doesn't get a cheque. I understand that.

Mr. Hodgson: I don't live in Metropolitan Toronto.

Mr. Laughren: And I understand what the member is trying to do in deliberately misinforming this legislative chamber, too.

Mr. Hodgson: I don't live in Metropolitan Toronto.

Mr. Laughren: I understand that very well.

Hon. Mr. Snow: You don't understand much.

Mr. Laughren: Is that the member for—

Mr. Hodgson: I don't live in Metropolitan Toronto or any part of it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the member for York North please refrain from interjecting?

Mr. Hodgson: I will, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Laughren: I would say that he's showing his true colours with his interjections, Mr. Speaker; and that at least is worth something, because he usually is afraid to do even that.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Laughren: Nothing's out of order.

Mr. Yakabuski: What that supper hour—
Interjections.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Laughren: Mr. Speaker, I ask you, what could be out of order?

Mr. Yakabuski: Can that supper hour ever fortify some people.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Your point of order?

Mr. Hodgson: The statement was made that I very usually never speak and I'm showing my true colours tonight.

Mr. Samis: "Very usually"?

Mr. Hodgson: I've always spoken up for my constituents and for other constituents in Ontario, but I don't normally run off at the mouth.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The honourable member doesn't have a point of order. That's a point of view.

Mr. Foulds: And a misinformed point of view, too.

Mr. Samis: You've struck out twice in a row now, Bill.

Mr. Laughren: I am very happy to have been here and to have heard the member's maiden speech. I am very impressed by his contribution.

Mr. Samis: What's the matter with the yakkor over there?

Mr. G. Taylor: He's made a greater contribution than you have made in all your years here.

Mr. Laughren: Mr. Speaker, I am trying not to be provocative, but it's very difficult.

Mr. G. Taylor: Then sit down.

Mr. Laughren: Hey, would you back off?

Mr. Germa: How about a little decorum?

Mr. Laughren: I'll tell you something, Mr. Speaker. The whole question of workers' compensation is distressingly similar to the whole question of occupational health and safety. If there's one area out there that says we still have a class system in Ontario, it's occupational health and compensation.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Absolute bunk!

Mr. Laughren: There's nothing else that indicates how large the chasm is between us and the government of Ontario. Nothing else says it so clearly.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Talk about deliberate misinformation and deliberately misleading—

Mr. Samis: Deliberately misleading?

Mr. Deans: I beg your pardon. What did you say?

Mr. Laughren: Would you repeat that?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I said, "Talk about deliberate misinformation or deliberately misleading."

Mr. Laughren: I'd be glad to. The Minister of Labour is an expert on that.

Mr. Deans: We could talk about that and quote her all day.

Mr. Laughren: If the Minister of Labour thinks that is not right, perhaps when she replies, which she may decide to do, she could tell us who it is that suffers under a bad compensation system in Ontario.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It's not a bad compensation system.

Mr. Laughren: Is it the people in the office towers down at King and Bay? Or is it the workers in the mines at Sudbury and Elliot Lake or on the construction jobs across this province? The minister knows who suffers from a bad compensation system; she administers it. She knows who it is.

Hon. B. Stephenson: We don't have a bad compensation system. We have a good compensation system.

Mr. Laughren: When was the last time you represented an injured construction worker before the Workmen's Compensation Board?

Mr. Renwick: There aren't any in York Mills.

Mr. Laughren: That's right. The minister knows, it's a class system, and I know it's a class system, just like occupational health is.

Hon. B. Stephenson: There is no class system in Ontario.

Mr. Laughren: The minister knows, and that's what makes her nervous about it.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, it doesn't.

Mr. Renwick: Of course it does.

Mr. Laughren: That's exactly what makes her nervous about it. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, we on this side understand very clearly why we have an inadequate compensation system in Ontario. It's very clear. We understand why it is that the Minister of Labour is not bringing forth Bill 70 this session. It's the same reason she delayed not bringing forth Bill 70 this session. It's the same reason she delayed three years on the improvements to the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the honourable member return and make his remarks in regard to Bill 126?

Mr. Laughren: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Thank you.

Mr. Laughren: One of the things that the bill fails to do which I think it should do, because it's certainly within the ambit of the principle of the bill—to return to that, which I know you're most anxious to do, Mr. Speaker—is to deal with the administrative problems of the board not some attitudinal problem. The Wyatt report which I know we're not debating, Mr. Speaker—

Hon. B. Stephenson: Will you sit down?

Mr. Hodgson: Or something.

Mr. Laughren: If the Minister of Labour has something to say let her rise in her place and I'd be glad to give her a moment.

Mr. Hodgson: If you sat down she might say something.

Mr. Laughren: Mr. Speaker, I can hardly wait for the member for York North to get up and express his views on the workmen's compensation system in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Hodgson: Come on, say something.

Mr. Laughren: This I've got to hear. It will be a first in this chamber.

Mr. Hodgson: I would not want to speak for a half an hour and not say anything.

Mr. Laughren: I want to tell you something.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Would the honourable member address his remarks to the chair and please disregard the interjections?

Mr. Laughren: Yes. You're much less provocative than the members opposite, I must say.

The bill itself is one, and you may find this hard to believe, which we are going to support. But, I'll tell you, it's not without some anguish. And for those reasons my colleague from Windsor-Sandwich has prepared some what I think are excellent amendments. As a matter of fact, they may be irresistible.

Mr. Eaton: Is all the party going to vote on it or are you going to split on that?

Mr. Laughren: Oh, when it comes to workmen's compensation we understand what we need to bring in a good compensation system.

That reminds me, Mr. Speaker, now that the member has triggered something in my own mind, that what the minister should be doing right now is taking a long look at the compensation system in Ontario. My colleague from Bellwoods touched on it when he said that what we really should be debating is whether or not we want the present system of compensation in the province of Ontario or a system that the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board recommended a long time ago and that's a comprehensive social insurance scheme—

Hon. B. Stephenson: That is not what he said.

Mr. Laughren: —that would protect all people in the province regardless of where they were injured.

Mr. McClellan: Of course I did.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, you didn't.

Mr. Laughren: The member for Bellwoods said it and the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board said it as well.

As a matter of fact, if you talk privately to the people on the Workmen's Compensation Board, which I do on a regular basis, they will tell you that what we need in the province of Ontario is a whole different concept of compensation, the way they have it in New Zealand, the way that the province of Saskatchewan has recommended.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I'd just like to remind the honourable member for Nickel Belt that Bill 126 contains reference only to the increase in compensation rates. I'd ask him to contain his remarks within that context.

Mr. Laughren: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I shall do that, and I shall do it very briefly.

Mr. C. Taylor: It's the best scheme in the world.

Mr. Bounsall: Oh, no it isn't.

Mr. Laughren: I'll tell you, Mr. Speaker, I would have been finished now if it hadn't been for the silly interjections from the other side. First of all, let's lay it to rest once and for all: we do not have the best system of compensation in the world. Let's put that to rest right now. We have an inadequate system of compensation in this jurisdiction. That's it, plain and simple. We don't have a good compensation system in Ontario.

Mr. Hodgson: Why do you come here? Why don't you go to New Zealand?

Mr. Laughren: What could be a better example? Mr. Speaker, one section of this bill deals with the maximum ceiling on which compensation benefits are computed. The old level was $15,000 a year. Full compensation is considered to be 75 per cent of $15,000 a year. The ministry has raised that level to $16,200. That's the new maximum on which compensation benefits will be computed. And we say, if you really believe that people should not be penalized because of being injured on the job, you simply take away that ceiling.

I'm going to listen very carefully to the minister's rationale, and the Liberal Party's rationale, as to why you need a ceiling on earnings to compute the level of compensation benefits? There is simply no justification for that ceiling.

In the province of Saskatchewan, which is, incidentally a socialist province—

Mr. Eaton: Wait until the next election there.

Mr. Bradley: It's the only one left.

An hon. member: You don't have many seats in BC.

Mr. Foulds: You haven't seen the latest polls, have you?

Mr. Laughren: We're proud of what we've got.

An hon. member: Of what we've done, anyway—

[8:30]

Mr. Laughren: Mr. Speaker, as in Saskatchewan, this is what the minister could have done, very simply. As a matter of fact, that was one of the reasons I gave her the model from which to work in a private member's bill in my name, which we debated here earlier. Personally, I would be quite happy to have no ceiling and regardless of someone's earnings, compute their compensation benefits on that level.

In Saskatchewan, they say any time more than 10 per cent of the claimants are earning in excess of the existing ceiling, which with this bill would be $16,200, then they bump up the ceiling $1,000. There's nothing illogical about that. There's nothing unreasonable about that, nothing that would bankrupt any compensation board. But what does the minister do? She sets an arbitrary level of $16,200, an eight per cent increase over the level established in July 1975.

How does she justify that? I am going to listen very carefully for her rationale because either one believes that workers should not be penalized for being injured on the job, or one believes they should be. That's really what it comes down to. So there's no doubt in my mind—I am not being provocative, I am not even being ideological—when I say the compensation system in Ontario is a class system. I mean it most seriously and the Minister of Labour understands that. She has been subjected to the lobbying a lot more than I have. She understands very clearly, on this just as with the occupational health issue, that's exactly what it boils down to. The minister knows it.

Mr. Speaker, we will support this bill, but I want to tell you it could be a lot better. I am most anxious to hear the minister's response on how she justifies a ceiling of $16,200; secondly, how she justifies a spouse's pension of $365 a month.

Mr. Foulds: Top limit.

Mr. Laughren: Well, I want to tell you that's a doctor speaking. That's a doctor speaking—

Mr. Warner: Not a Minister of Labour.

Mr. Laughren: —who will never have to worry about living on $365 a month.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I did for years. You don't know anything about me.

Mr. Laughren: I don't like to be personal, but I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker—

Hon. B. Stephenson: You have been personal for the last year.

Mr. Laughren: —no one who has had to live on even twice that income would ever suggest that someone should have to live on half of it. It's not possible and it is fundamentally, morally and ethically wrong to ask a spouse to live on that kind of income. Doesn't the minister think there are enough problems in the home already without subjecting a spouse to an income of $365 a month? And the minister doesn't need to talk to me about the dependant's allowance. I know what that is. But there might also not be any dependant's allowance beyond the spouse's allowance, so that's an irrelevant argument. I will be surprised to see the amendments. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, there's nothing at all unreasonable about the amendments to be put in the committee stage by the member for Windsor-Sandwich, extremely reasonable.

The third point is the whole question of indexing. Why do we subject ourselves to this every two years, three years?

Mr. Foulds: Five years.

Mr. Laughren: Why can we not have an indexing system so workers in the province of Ontario who get injured through no fault of their own, are automatically compensated in a fair and reasonable way? How does the minister justify this nonsense of going through the anguish of this every three years? You know, some day we might end up with a Minister of Labour who doesn't care about workers.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Warner: Another one?

Mr. Speaker: I have listened very carefully to what the member for Nickel Belt has had to say. Since I took over the chair, you have been on the mark. Now you are talking about something that is not in the bill.

Mr. Haggerty: Again.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Still.

Mr. Hodgson: That's what I thought half an hour ago.

Mr. Laughren: Well, the principle of the bill is to raise the level of benefits for workers. I am just suggesting a way to improve what's in the bill. I am suggesting to you, Mr. Speaker, that the increase in the level of benefits, while we are going to support it—because it terrifies me to think what this Minister of Labour would do if we didn't support it—we are not entirely satisfied with it.

Mr. Foulds: Probably withdraw it.

Mr. Mackenzie: Withdraw it for another year.

Mr. Laughren: Well, exactly. She's quite capable of withdrawing this bill the way she did Bill 70 and that's something we are not prepared to tolerate.

Mr. Lupusella: That's how you play your own game.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Bill 70 isn't withdrawn.

Mr. Laughren: Don't give me that nonsense. You have withdrawn Bill 70 to all intents and purposes. I will be surprised if it's recognizable when it comes back before this chamber in the fall.

Mr. Lupusella: That's a vicious game.

Mr. Laughren: I will conclude by urging as strongly as I can that the Liberal Party cast aside its class biases and support the amendments that will be put forth by the member for Windsor-Sandwich.

Mr. di Santo: I would like to speak at this point in support of my colleague's amendments to the bill introduced by the Minister of Labour. I cannot refrain from saying this bill is only a very small step towards what injured workers have been waiting for for three years since July 1, 1975.

With this bill, the Minister of Labour realizes perfectly well that she hasn't solved the problems of the injured workers of the province of Ontario. On that side of the House, they can use all their rhetoric in saying this is the best system in the world, but there are no other countries in the world where seven injured workers have to face the court, as they have in Ontario, because of fighting for three years against the government.

There is no other democratic jurisdiction in the world where injured workers are disposed of, as this government is doing with them, as useless people who cannot contribute anymore to the economic machinery of this province.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That is not true.

Mr. Laughren: It is true. We understand power. We understand you are in power.

Mr. Lupusella: She should resign as minister.

Mr. di Santo: That is what you are doing. We have been fighting on this side of the House.

Mr. Lupusella: How can we cope with this situation for so many years?

Mr. Speaker: Will the member for Dovercourt stop interrupting his colleague from Downsview?

Mr. Samis: He is helping.

Mr. di Santo: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The support of my colleagues is most helpful.

Mr. Bradley: You are not very selective about your assistance.

Mr. Laughren: But the quality is there.

Mr. di Santo: If I had to select, I could mention the extremely important speech made by the member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Kerrio) who was speaking against the bill of my colleague for Nickel Belt—

Mr. Lupusella: Shame on the Liberal Party.

Mr. O'Neil: You should have him here so he can defend himself. He hasn't a chance to defend himself.

Mr. di Santo:—who proposed, incidentally, exactly what this bill said. He spoke on April 13 at 4:50 p.m. in this House and said that was the most irresponsible piece of legislation he had seen in this House.

Mr. Laughren: Exactly right. I remember it well.

Mr. di Santo: I am not concerned with the attitude of the Liberal Party. We know exactly where they stand.

Mr. O'Neil: We are glad you do.

Mr. Laughren: It is irrelevant.

Mr. Eaton: It is usually hard to tell.

Mr. di Santo: For them, the injured workers are only political pawns as long as it doesn't disturb the peace with their smallenterprise, narrow-minded mentality and approach.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Is this the principle of the bill?

Mr. Foulds: They are dogmatic, too.

Mr. Sweeney: The member is sinking to the level of his radical colleagues.

Mr. Hall: Are you on Bill 70?

Mr. Bradley: You are being encouraged by the wrong people over there. The member for Nickel Belt has warped your mind.

Mr. Laughren: He required no help.

Mr. Eaton: That came out wrong.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I hope Hansard recorded that.

Mr. di Santo: Bill 126 responds only to some limited needs of the injured workers. In fact, the increases which have been explained at length by my colleagues are not even adequate, do not even correspond with the increase in the cost of living in the meantime.

What we would have seen from a Minister of Labour with some sensitivity, who would not act with that spirit of prevarication that she has used in this House and with the workers in the last three years.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I have not.

Mr. di Santo: We would have expected the Minister of Labour would have responded to some of the major problems the injured workers are faced with, and the problems are not only those of compensation although compensation is important. We know it is humiliating for the injured workers to keep fighting and standing in front of the Legislature at the beginning of every session because the Minister of Labour doesn't want to increase their benefits. We know there are more important problems, the problems of their human dignity.

We are talking here of numbers, 25 per cent increase in the benefits and 37 per cent increase in the cost of living, but what we are not talking about is the human dignity of thousands of people who are hurt every day when they happen to have an accident on the job.

Mr. Laughren: None of them are doctors either.

Mr. di Santo: That is something your bill doesn't speak about. We are not talking in this bill of the thousands of workers who, once injured, are not able to return to a profitable job because this system and this government doesn't want to take into account the fact that there are human beings who may not be totally productive, because productivity is one of the ideas the government cannot relinquish, that could be useful to themselves and to their families.

Personally, with my colleague from Beaches-Woodbine (Ms. Bryden), I have tried several times to introduce a bill which is the law in many countries of the western world, as we like to call it, a law which would provide injured workers, disabled people, with an opportunity to have employment by way of making it compulsory for the government and for the private sector to hire a certain number of injured workers.

I would like to tell you, Mr. Speaker, if that were the case in the province of Ontario, with a working force of four million people and 34,000 or 35,000 partially disabled workers with partial disability pensions, we could solve the problem if a bill were passed which made it compulsory to hire one per cent injured workers in the total working force of Ontario.

Of course the Minister of Labour doesn't respond to this. We have seen that several times in the committee debating the Workmen's Compensation Board report every year. We are not hopeful at this time that the callousness of the government will be removed by the reality because they don't look at the reality, and also because I think the government is convinced the injured workers are not a pressure group strong enough to make its weight felt at the ballot box.

I want to tell the Minister of Labour that we will keep fighting. This is a human problem and whether she likes it or not, she has to come to terms with us, she has to come to terms with the injured worker, because this is a permanent problem in our society that she doesn't want to solve and she will be forced to solve it.

If the minister doesn't want to solve it, we will fight for it and make the people of Ontario aware of the problem, which is not a partisan problem, that is what the Minister of Labour doesn't understand. This is not a partisan problem. It's a problem that has to be seen in human terms, as it is in many other jurisdictions of the world.

The bill doesn't address itself to another major problem, which is one of my greatest concerns.

Mr. Speaker: Order. You're not going to express that concern on this bill, because I've given the honourable member as much leeway as I can. Under the rules of the House, when you deliberately set out to say "another principle that this bill does not address is" you're clearly admitting that you're not speaking to the principle of the bill.

Mr. di Santo: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would have liked to have seen this bill solve one of the other major problems that we are faced with with the Workmen's Compensation Board. That is, all those workers who end up in the so-called rehabilitation system of the Workmen's Compensation Board, and who, for some strange reason, end up being examined by psychiatrists.

On May 5, the Minister of Labour, answering one of my questions, gave me this account, which is quite appalling: "From 1974 to 1977, 4,254 injured workers, disabled workers, were referred to psychiatrists." This is a tragedy in many families, because we are confronted every day, the members—

Mr. Speaker: Which section of the bill are you referring to?

Mr. di Santo: This is the principle.

Mr. Speaker: What section?

Mr. di Santo: This is the principle of the bill.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It has nothing to do with the principle of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: The honourable member inform me what section of the bill he's talking about?

Mr. Warner: The principle, the explanatory notes.

Mr. di Santo: This is the principle of the bill in the explanatory notes, if you allow me.

Mr. Laughren: Talk about the principle of the bill. It is not clause by clause.

Mr. di Santo: This is part of the benefit the minister has increased, only momentarily. We don't think the financial part is the only important part, because this is an aspect which is crucial. You referred 4,254 injured workers through the Workmen's Compensation Board to psychiatrists because, I suspect, the board has a vested interest in saying that those workers were disabled, not because of the accident, but because they had psychological or psychiatric problems. This is one of the worst features of the Workmen's Compensation Board that you should have corrected in this bill.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Laughren: Section 1.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The proportion is less than it is in the general population.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the honourable member insists on straying from the principle of this bill, I'm going to have to ask him to take his seat and recognize the next speaker. If he can confine his remarks to the principle of Bill 126 I will allow him to continue, otherwise I'll have to ask him to take his seat.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Throw him out.

Mr. di Santo: It was my impression that I was referring myself to section 1 of the bill, but I accept your ruling and I move further, because I want to talk about another aspect of the bill that I think is really important, and which was not dealt with by the minister in 1974 and 1975. That is the rate of compensation. I'm referring myself to section 1 of the bill now.

As my colleagues have said before, the increases introduced by the minister are quite arbitrary, not only because of the percentage chosen by the minister, but because of the whole system on which the compensation is based. As you know, Mr. Speaker, a pension is based on the earnings of an injured worker 12 months before the accident.

It happens that with this bill there is an increase in the pensions of the injured workers starting from 1975 with the percentage spelled out by the bill. But what the bill doesn't take into account is that if the worker had an injury or became disabled 20 years ago, in this bill we are giving him an increase on the basis of his 1975 pension. We are not making any relation whatsoever to the wages of the workers who are performing a similar job today. I think that's wrong and I think that the minister should recognize it.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Have another drink. That's the best part of the speech.

Mr. Laughren: What's that supposed to mean?

Mr. di Santo: Certainly, the member for Rainy River is not one of the persons who can speak on this bill. In fact, nobody on that side of the House is speaking.

Mr. O'Neil: Oh come on now, that's not right.

Mr. Laughren: When you do speak you want to lower the level of benefits.

Mr. Bounsell: Your speech was an appeal to give you time to read the report.

Mr. T. P. Reid: They never let the truth be known.

Mr. Laughren: There is the clown from Rainy River.

Mr. di Santo: Mr. Speaker, I think that in all fairness we should recognize that if a worker has an injury today 20 years from now we shouldn't give him compensation on the basis of what he's earning today. Because, if he had the chance—I'll repeat it for the minister.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I think you've got it backwards, but I know what you mean.

Mr. di Santo: The minister has it wrong. I'd like to tell the minister that for the last three years everything that I heard from her has been wrong, and I can quote from Hansard if she wants.

What I'm saying is that if the worker has an accident today we shouldn't attach his pension to what he is earning today. Because 20 years from now if he had the chance he could have improved himself and he could have earned what the workers in the same group and in the same category would have earned. That is what is happening today with this bill. We are giving a totally disabled worker $500 regardless of the fact that he could be earning $15,000 or $20,000 today. I hope the minister realizes that this is an injustice.

Mr. Laughren: Kerrio is going to speak. The member for Niagara Falls is going to speak.

Mr. di Santo: There is another section of the bill that I'd like the minister to explain to us, and that is section 3(2) where it says: "Subsection 9 of the said section 42, as re-enacted by the Statutes of Ontario, 1975, chapter 47, section 6, is repealed and the following is substituted therefor"—

Mr. Kerrio: Did he put that in the record again? That's looney. That's ridiculous.

Mr. di Santo:—and it says that that section doesn't apply to lump sum payments.

Mr. Samis: Calm down, Vince.

Mr. Kerrio: That's a disgrace.

Mr. T. P. Reid: What he is saying is they don't have the ability to make their own decisions, but the NDP will make them for them.

Mr. Foulds: With the shape you're in tonight, somebody should be making your decisions for you.

Mr. Laughren: Go back to the party, Reid.

Mr. McClellan: Go back to your party and talk about trees.

Mr. T. P. Reid: I know more about trees, Ross, than you know about children's services.

Mr. Laughren: Go back to your party.

Mr. di Santo: I would like to remind the minister that in 1974, before we both were elected, when the amendment was introduced this section was applied also to the commuted pensions. In 1975, when the amendment was introduced, the amendment was not applied to the commuted pensions and she is doing the same now.

I could give the minister many examples. When the Workmen's Compensation Board also increased the commuted pensions after the amendments introduced in 1975, for some arcane reasons I didn't understand they decided they should comply with the amendments of 1975. As a matter of fact I had to go to the Ombudsman because I had some cases in which the increases were given and some cases in which they were not granted.

I would like the minister to clarify for us why it is that for an injured worker who had his pension commuted because his pension was rated by the Workmen's Compensation Board less than 10 per cent, he should not be qualified for an increase that the minister is granting to all the other injured workers who have a pension granted more than 10 per cent. I think that's really an injustice. It's one of the injustices that should be corrected.

I think that my colleague, the member for Windsor-Sandwich, will introduce an amendment and I hope that the minister will accept it because I don't think this is controversial. I think it is understood by everybody that somebody who has an injury, it doesn't matter the rating—five, ten or 15 per cent—if we think at this time that there is a need for an increase in the benefits because of the increase in the cost of living in the interval, it should cover all the injured workers. It should not discriminate against those injured workers who had chosen for their personal reasons to have their pension commuted or because the Workmen's Compensation Board had commuted their pension because it was rated less than 10 per cent. I hope the minister will explain—

Mr. Speaker: Order, order. I have been just about as patient as I am going to be with the honourable member. If the honourable member can tell me what section of this bill deals with that aspect of workmen's compensation that you are talking about now, I will allow him to continue. Otherwise I will call on another member.

Mr. di Santo: Mr. Speaker, it is section 3—

Mr. Bradley: Section 10.

Mr. di Santo: Section 3, subsections 2 and 9.

Mr. Kerrio: Mr. Speaker, on a point of personal privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Point of privilege.

Mr. Kerrio: I have a translation of a letter written to an Italian newspaper in the city of Toronto, and I would like to read to you the words of the member who's on the floor right now.

Mr. Samis: Is that relevant?

Mr. Sweeney: The member wasn't here and he made some comments.

Mr. Kerrio: He made some comments about this member.

Just be quiet and you might learn something, George.

At the end of the letter, after he had talked about increases in workmen's compensation and widows' pensions, the member has written: "In conclusion, I would like to point out to you the attitude of the Liberal representative from Niagara, Vince Kerrio, who has rejected the law proposal by calling it irresponsible. Since he is of Italian origin, he should understand that after three years, the invalids and the widows are not irresponsible in requesting that their benefits be raised."

[9:00]

Mr. Laughren: What is your point of privilege?

Mr. Kerrio: The point of privilege is that I have before me everything that was entered in Hansard where I participated in the debate. I challenge that member now to stand on the floor and suggest anywhere in the debate in which I participated that I addressed myself to anything other than the bill before me—

Mr. Laughren: You are making an ass of yourself. You're making a fool of yourself.

Mr. Eaton: Mr. Speaker, make him withdraw that.

Mr. Kerrio:—and suggested anywhere in all the remarks that I made that the portion where I referred to his irresponsibility was in the funding of the increases.

Mr. Laughren: Oh Vince, go home.

Mr. Kerrio: The member for Nickel Belt is just making a lot of noise because he doesn't know what he's talking about. He would be wise if he kept his big mouth shut.

Mr. Laughren: You are making a fool of yourself.

Mr. Kerrio: I'd like to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I'm quite disturbed about this. I would very well have liked to let it rest at that juncture. But the member saw fit to come before the Legislature and repeat it, and that is something I am not going to buy.

Mr. Bradley: When you were not here, by the way.

Mr. Kerrio: Subsequent to his participation, the minister has seen fit to raise—

Mr. Samis: Is this a speech?

Mr. Makarchuk: Is this the principle?

Mr. Kerrio: I'm talking on a point of privilege, if you'd like to know, Mr. Yahoo. The point that really disturbs me is that I was referring to the irresponsibility of that member's bill when he did not know who was going to fund the increases.

Mr. McClellan: Yes, he did.

Mr. Kerrio: Nowhere in all of the responses that I made did I not concur that I was in full accord with raising the funds to people who were invalidated, widows and everyone else that was suffering in Ontario. I defy him, I ask him right now to point out one place in this debate where I made any point other than what I am suggesting here on my point of personal privilege.

Mr. Bradley: Ask him to retract.

Mr. Kerrio: I ask him to retract.

Mr. di Santo: On the point of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Riddell: Show your honesty and integrity now.

Mr. Laughren: What would you know about that?

Mr. Riddell: I will match mine with yours any day.

Mr. di Santo: We have to deal with the Fleck workers.

Mr. Kerrio: Read from Hansard.

Mr. di Santo: On April 13, 1978, Hansard no. 36, on page 1498, it say: "Mr. Kerrio: I will not address myself to any of the interjections because that is a ploy of the socialists to get you to leave your theme. As far as I am concerned, this is a most irresponsible piece of legislation."

Mr. Kerrio: Read on.

Mr. Warner: Case rested. That's the case. Case closed.

Mr. Sweeney: Don't confuse me with the facts.

Mr. O'Neil: Give the whole chapter; don't take it out of context.

Mr. di Santo: I can read on.

Mr. Kerrio: Are you not going to read any more? You took one sentence out of context, didn't you?

Mr. Foulds: It's not out of context and you know it full well.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The member for Niagara Falls has had his say. He explained what he thinks is a point of privilege. Allow the member for Downsview to speak.

Mr. di Santo: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Will all due respect, I quote again from the member for Niagara Falls: "As far as I am concerned, this is a most irresponsible piece of legislation."

Mr. Kerrio: Go on.

Mr. di Santo: The piece of legislation which we were discussing that day addressed itself to three points: One, that the benefits be increased according to the cost of living; two, that widows' pensions be increased to $400; and—

Mr. Kerrio: You are not reading from Hansard.

Mr. di Santo: —three, that dependants' allowances be increased to $100. That was the principle of the bill.

Mr. Kerrio: Are you not going to read the rest?

Mr. di Santo: The member for Niagara Falls said that was a most irresponsible piece of legislation.

Mr. Sweeney: Read Hansard. Read the record.

Mr. Kerrio: Look at the experts down there trying to find something. Look at the two of them—a fine combination.

Mr. Warner: The member for Niagara Falls should withdraw.

Mr. Kerrio: You have used this Legislature. A yoyo like you.

Mr. di Santo: Mr. Speaker, if the member for Niagara Falls has any dignity at all, he should stand up in this House and apologize to the injured workers.

Mr. Kerrio: Have the two experts down in front come up with something from Hansard?

Mr. di Santo: But going back to—

Mr. Speaker: The member for Rainy River has the floor.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this matter of privilege. I have had the opportunity to glance very briefly over Hansard and to see what was said. It seems to me that my friend who has just spoken and who has the opportunity that most of us do not have to edit and publish a newspaper—

Mr. di Santo: You are not able to do that. You are almost illiterate.

Mr. Sweeney: You are not able to make the distortions that you do.

Mr. T. P. Reid: —has taken what we used to call poetic licence—

Mr. di Santo: It was a quote; it was not licence.

Mr. T. P. Reid: —to interpret what was said in this Legislature to his own means. My reading of the matter is that my colleague from Niagara Falls said that what was in the particular bill as proposed by the member was particularly irresponsible—

Mr. di Santo: Right. Exactly.

Mr. T. P. Reid: —but he went on to list what he felt was due to the people who unfortunately found themselves in that position as a result of accidents that had happened. It seems to me that particular member has used his position, not only as an MPP but as an editor of a newspaper, to select, if I may say that—

Mr. Bradley: Misrepresent.

Mr. Samis: Where's the point of privilege?

Mr. T. P. Reid: —perhaps I might go so far as to say, in my opinion to misrepresent the opinions as expressed by the member for Niagara Falls—

Mr. Makarchuk: Like the Toronto Sun.

Mr. T. P. Reid: —and to mislead those people who might have occasion to read that particular newspaper.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have heard enough from the member for Rainy River. Is he suggesting that I have the authority and responsibility to edit every newspaper that appears?

Mr. T. P. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry; I didn't mean to indicate that you had that authority. But if I may preface my remarks in response to that, I do feel—and I say this with due respect to all members—we have seen judgements handed down by the chair, with all due respect, and by the procedural affairs committee and others, that indicate to me, quite frankly, that the privileges of members of this House seem almost non-existent.

If we look at the record in the last six months, the privileges of the members of this House, at least as I as a member understood them—

Mr. Laughren: As an elitist.

Mr. T. P. Reid: —are non-existent; there are no privileges before this House that exist as individuals in the community. It is something you and I have spoken about, Mr. Speaker, and it disturbs me greatly. I would agree with your comment that perhaps you do not have the authority to address yourself to a newspaper, whether it's edited by Mr. Malone of the Globe and Mail or my friend Odoardo di Santo—

Mr. Laughren: What is this? Do we have to listen to this nonsense?

Mr. Samis: Where's the point of privilege?

Mr. T. P. Reid: —but I say to you, that I think we have an obligation, to see that comments made by a member in this House are not slanted or misinterpreted but are taken at face value. I think there is a special obligation when a member of this House also has the responsibility of being an editor and publisher of a newspaper; he has more of a responsibility than the editor of the Globe and Mail or the Star, or even the Sun, if I may bring that into it, to be a little more honest and straightforward in his opinions.

Mr. Speaker: Is there anybody else who hasn't already spoken who wishes to speak to this alleged point of privilege?

Mr. di Santo: I would like to speak to that.

Mr. Speaker: You have already spoken.

Mr. di Santo: But—

Mr. Speaker: You have already spoken.

Mr. Kerrio: Sit down. You have done enough damage.

Mr. Foulds: Frankly, I don't know what all the fuss is about from the member for Rainy River and the member for Niagara Falls. I would like to read the full quotation into the record right now and just let people decide what in fact the member said.

He said: "As far as I am concerned, this is a most irresponsible piece of legislation," referring to the bill brought forward by the member for Nickel Belt. "The member hasn't addressed himself to the real truth of real involvement, of real responsibility."

Mr. Kerrio: Hasn't addressed himself to the truth.

Mr. Foulds: That is what I said. I said "hasn't."

Mr. Kerrio: Be very clear about it.

Mr. Foulds: He said: "It is one of the real things I say about government." I don't know what that means, so I won't put a gloss on it.

Then Mr. McClellan interjected: "Vince, you are not real."

Mr. Kerrio: Keep reading on.

Mr. Foulds: Mr. Kerrio continued: "Priorities are very significant and important. We cannot look after a person injured in the work place to the exclusion of someone who happens to be injured on his way home from work. I don't have to go around and be defied by people who would suggest that because I would vote"—and I am underlining this—"against such a bill as this, that doesn't make any sense at all, that I am against the worker. Nothing could be further from the truth—"

Mr. Kerrio: You hit the key line.

Mr. Foulds: —"and I would like to see members who say so make that stick."

The comment I would like to make after reading the full quotation is that the member did make two statements that are clear and unequivocal. I do not believe his privileges have been breached.

The two statements that are clear and unequivocal are, one, he says: "As far as I am concerned, this is a most irresponsible piece of legislation," and two, "I would vote against any such bill as this."

Mr. Bradley: Two well selected passages, I might say.

Mr. O'Neil: What about the third one?

Mr. Foulds: I just underline those two selected passages in the context of what I read.

Mr. Breithaupt: Yes, you selected them.

Mr. Bradley: Nice choice.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have heard—

Mr. Breithaupt: Sufficient.

Mr. Speaker: Sufficient is right. I have heard the honourable member who raised the alleged point of privilege. I have heard from his colleague from Rainy River. I have heard from the member for Downsview and the member for Port Arthur.

Clearly, there is a difference in the interpretation of what was said and what was meant. Notwithstanding the comments of the member for Rainy River, I don't think there is any privilege that is contained in the standing orders that the chair needs to address itself to at this time.

Clearly, there is a difference of opinion, and a difference of interpretation. I fail to recognize a privilege of this House that has been abrogated in any way. Is the member for Quinte challenging my ruling?

Mr. O'Neil: No, I am not challenging, but I would like to say something on it.

Mr. Laughren: Dig yourself in deeper.

Mr. Speaker: I think we have had enough discussion on it. This can go on ad infinitum and we are not going to resolve the situation. There is clearly a difference of opinion.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Let Hansard show that this is a difference of opinion and not a matter of fact.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Niagara Falls has stated what he said and his interpretation of what he said. There is clearly a difference of opinion. I don't think it is a breach of privilege.

Mr. Breithaupt: Let us proceed.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Downsview.

Mr. Kerrio: You would be wise to stick to the bill and mind your business, and the rest of you too. You make a big monkey of this Legislature in doing what you want here.

Mr. Warner: Did you have dinner at Dineley's?

Mr. Makarchuk: You have come unzipped.

Mr. Kerrio: You are a big yapper.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The interjections don't help one iota.

Mr. di Santo: If the member for Niagara Falls would accept the defeat graciously, it would help us to keep debating the bill.

Mr. Sweeney: No such thing.

Mr. Kerrio: You want to keep the fire going.

Mr. di Santo: You have to come to terms with your leader.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It would help also if the member for Downsview would address his remarks to the chair.

Mr. di Santo: I would like to sum up what I said before. I would like to tell the Minister of Labour—and I am referring again for your benefit, Mr. Speaker, to section 3(2)—that I would have loved to see the commuted benefits also included in this bill and not deliberately excluded as they are.

[9:15]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I've warned the honourable member not to refer to something that has been omitted in the bill. He has just said that he is chagrined because something is not in the bill. You must address your remarks—how often must I remind you—that you can only talk to something that is in the bill, not something that is not in the bill.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Contempt of the Speaker, I call it.

Mr. di Santo: Yes, I'm sorry, Mr. Speaker. It's section 1(6) that excludes the commuted benefits.

Mr. Speaker: I couldn't care less what section excludes it from the bill. You have to address yourself to something that is contained in the bill, a principle of the bill.

Mr. Makarchuk: But it's excluding the commuted payments.

Mr. McClellan: It's in the bill, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: He says it isn't in the bill.

Mr. di Santo: It is.

Mr. McClellan: Section 1(6) excludes the—

Mr. Foulds: Mr. Speaker, if I could clarify.

Mr. T. P. Reid: He is obviously confused, Mr. Speaker, and we beg your indulgence.

Mr. Bradley: The circus has come early.

Mr. di Santo: Section 1(6) says that the amounts payable under clauses (c) and (d) of subsection 1 of the said section as re-enacted do not apply to a lump sum award or the payments due prior to the effective dates. My opinion is that it should apply also to those injured workers who had a lump sum payment.

Mr. Kerrio: You are on your way out and you don't even know it.

Mr. di Santo: In summing up my remarks, we support this bill because we know what will happen if we tried to amend it the way we want. The same thing would happen that's happening to Bill 70. I hope the other members will accept the very minor amendments that my colleague from Windsor-Sandwich will introduce in the spirit of making this a better bill, and in the conviction that the whole Workmen's Compensation Act should be changed. Eventually we should go to what even the chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board thought was a good idea—a universal system of insurance for injured people. Thank you.

Mr. Laughren: Point of order. I wonder if the Speaker would rule on the fact that there has been a number of New Democrats speaking in succession on this bill—whether or not he would rule that it's time for a Liberal speaker to—

Mr. Speaker: It's not a point of order.

Mr. Laughren: Okay.

Mr. Bradley: It's a point of sarcasm.

Mr. Haggerty: I rise to support the principle of Bill 126. I was interested in the comments of the previous speakers on the bill. I say that perhaps we've lost contact with ourselves tonight.

Mr. Laughren: Have you come unhinged, Ray?

Mr. Haggerty: I suppose we can look to the other side over there and say it's the usual practice by the present minister and the previous ministers to bring in a bill of such importance at this late date, when the House perhaps will adjourn tomorrow. I think that more consideration should be given to the Legislature so we can have reasonable debate on such an important bill. To put a time limit on it doesn't give the speakers and those interested in it a chance to put in the approach they should in consideration of the bill.

I look at the bill there and the amount of money that's going to be increased to the persons who are injured and in particular I look at section 1 of the bill that applies to the widow or widower as the sole dependent of monthly payments. It may seem that from $318 to $365 is a substantial increase.

Mr. Laughren: Going to support our amendment, Ray? We have got support for the amendment.

Mr. Haggerty: In comparison I suppose, I could comment on the Wyatt report—

Mr. Bradley: Keep it up and they'll move you to the back benches over there.

Mr. Haggerty: —which, I suppose, is open for much dialogue later on in the session. I can only read the one comment in the report and I'm not too happy with it. It says, "We do have sympathy for the working poor."

Mr. Laughren: They don't want sympathy.

Mr. Haggerty: I hope when the amendments do come forward concerning the Wyatt report that they have more than sympathy for the working poor. If you look at the Canada Pension Plan and old age supplement—

Mr. Speaker: That's not a principle of this bill.

Mr. Haggerty: I'm using it as an example when it comes to the terms of benefits paid. When you apply it to two spouses under old age security and the supplement, you have an income of almost $7,330, Mr. Speaker. I'd like to have the minister, or anybody on that side, show me where any person is in receipt of workmen's compensation of $7,330 a year. The minister does not match that at all. The minister is frowning over there.

I think about a person with a permanent disability who has no other source of income who will receive approximately $7 a month increase on a $70 or $80 pension. It's most pitiful that we talk about assisting those injured workers here in Ontario.

I don't know why there is such misinterpretation of section 42(5) of the Act by members of this Legislature and those persons who are responsible for looking after it at the Workmen's Compensation Board. When a person goes out with a disability pension and a rating of 10 per cent and $70 a month and they do obtain some light modified job such as a school crossing guard, even now they're taking action to say that's not good enough. They say they should be applying for a job in some other community across the province.

So I say to the minister, with the section that applies to those persons who have been injured before 1975 as suggested in the bill, that more consideration should be given to the persons who were injured previously. They can't get by on what is given to them through workmen's compensation. They have less chance, in the first place, to obtain full employment.

There are grey areas perhaps where persons who are receiving benefits today also are in good standing with a good job. Perhaps we should be looking at that and saying that maybe some of that money should be passed on to those less fortunate—some of the working poor. But I say to the minister that we welcome the suggestions in here that there will be some increase, but it just doesn't go quite far enough.

If you look at the single person receiving old age pension and the supplement, there is the basic $3,665 per year. Again, if you look at what you're offering some of these people here, that source of income for a disabled person will not even match the $3,000. I can cite case after case, as the member for Nickel Belt has mentioned. I think I also spend much of my time looking after persons who have been injured and who have problems with the Workmen's Compensation Board. I spend quite a bit of my time down at the board with a number of appeals. I find that the difficulty is there.

I said before to the minister I can only assume that all persons actually receive today who are on partial, permanent disability is the interest on the amount of money that is set aside by the Workmen's Compensation Board that applies to the industry. It says that for a 10 per cent rating, or something like that, there is a $14,000 assessment against that industry. All that you're giving them is that interest on the $14,000 per year.

No wonder the minister can come in and say that they've had the money all along. I'm sure she's had the money for the last three years. Then she comes in now and says that she's going to give them a measly increase to workmen's compensation.

Hopefully, when the fall comes and we will have ample time to get into this Wyatt report, there are comments in there that are really debatable and are contentious.

I suggest to the minister that the intent of the resolution introduced by myself and supported by the government and members of the Liberal Party is that we want to see fair compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act. Until those changes come about, it is not a fair program for many, many injured workers in the province of Ontario. And I hope the minister will have time, perhaps, with a committee of the Legislature to report and deal with this matter in full detail, as well as all the other necessary information that has been handed to the Wyatt firm that did the study. But I suggest to the minister and to members of the House that we have no other choice but to go along with the minister in her recommendations for an increase to the workmen's compensation.

However, there are many areas where this aid can be improved. I thought after three years we would see some vast improvements in assistance given to injured workers across Ontario.

I still have strong reservations about the rehabilitation program, and of course it's not here. But it does have, Mr. Speaker, some serious effect on the benefits that are applied to the injured worker. I support the bill in principle, and that's about all I can do, because it does not go quite far enough. I wish the minister had the time to go through my files—I have almost four cabinets filled with workmen's compensation cases—and, perhaps like other members, we could travel across Ontario to assist in the cause of workmen's compensation.

This measly increase doesn't go far enough. And I suggest to the minister that if the money was there three years ago, then perhaps there is more now that can be given.

I understand that my colleagues to the left have certain amendments to put forward. Some of these amendments, perhaps, might be of interest to a number of us here. I don't know whether we shall be able to support them, but I shall take a serious, close look at them.

I suggest that there are many improvements that have to be made in some direction by the minister to the board under section 42(5). There definitely has to be a clear-cut line on this particular section from the minister or from the Legislature on how to interpret that particular section of the act. I notice that section 41—I think it's 41(8)(c)—relates to the 1975 increase of the two per cent for a number of years. The increase now will be 11 per cent in that particular area.

For a person drawing a small pension, it means nothing to him, except greater hardship, perhaps. I suggest to the minister that the Wyatt report should be debated some time in the fall, and that there should be some key amendments to the workmen's compensation.

I think we are looking for a universal program covering any person injured in Ontario. This is my goal, and I am sure it is the minister's too, and I trust we eventually come out with a workable program that will provide sufficient means to support and sustain a decent living for many injured workers and their families.

I support the bill in principle.

Mr. Lupusella: I rise in support of this bill, Mr. Speaker, and share the particular position taken by so many members of this Legislature, particularly by the New Democratic Party members, that this bill is not really going far enough to represent and solve the problems of injured workers in Ontario.

[9:30]

I am supporting this bill because I am really sorry about the physical, social and economic conditions under which injured workers have been living in Ontario since 1975. I am supporting this particular bill not because the government and the Minister of Labour in particular have been quite generous in solving the problems faced by injured workers in Ontario, but because the injured workers have been suffering the consequences of the constant inaction of this government, not just since 1975 but since 1914, when the Workmen's Compensation Board was formed in Ontario to represent the interests of employers and not the interests of employees, especially not the workers of Ontario. That's the kind of principle I want to emphasize tonight.

The Minister of Labour has been playing with injured workers' lives since 1975. I think it is time this government and the Minister of Labour, in co-operation with the Liberal Party, stopped this game. We are dealing with human beings. I don't think this bill really reflects the financial needs of injured workers. This government has an obligation to recognize the great contribution made by workers, and especially those people who have been injured on the job in making this contribution, to the economic growth of this province.

I don't think the Minister of Labour and the Liberal Party have been really concerned about recognizing this contribution made by injured workers in Ontario to building this great province called Ontario. In some ways I feel sorry and upset and frustrated; I really don't understand why the member for Niagara Falls should be resentful of the criticism raised by my colleague—

Mr. Bradley: Because it's a distortion.

Mr. Kerrio: On a point of personal privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Lupusella: —because both parties have been suffering a political—

Mr. Kerrio: Point of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Lupusella: —in relation to the needs of injured workers in Ontario.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kerrio: Point of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: What's your point of privilege?

Mr. Kerrio: My point of privilege is that they keep reading something into the record that shouldn't be there.

An hon. member: I agree with you, Vince; you shouldn't have made the statement.

Mr. Kerrio: I would like to set the record straight. I would like to relate what was actually said.

Mr. Lupusella: Are you trying to delay the progress of this bill?

Mr. Kerrio: I want to refer to that, Mr. Speaker. If you are going to allow them to debate that particular bill, which was debated on April 13—

Hon. B. Stephenson: And defeated.

Mr. Kerrio: —then I should be allowed to make some remarks in response to their remarks. I would like to read into the record my remarks on the bill as recorded at page 1497 in Hansard.

Mr. Laughren: You've already done this.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is this—

Mr. Kerrio: I'm going to read one paragraph, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Laughren: You already did that.

Mr. Kerrio: I listened to you. I listened to you kooks.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Laughren: How many points of privilege are you going to have tonight, Vince? Every time you are quoted accurately you rise on a point of privilege.

Mr. Kerrio: And what's he doing sitting down in a front seat? He's sitting out of his place and making a remark.

Mr. Laughren: Every time you are quoted accurately—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Will the honourable member take his seat? Do I understand this point of privilege to be exactly the same as the point of privilege discussed earlier?

Mr. Kerrio: No. It relates to what he said now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Let me hear your point of privilege.

Mr. Kerrio: My point of privilege is that they are reading something into Hansard and I would like to correct the record.

Mr. di Santo: He didn't read anything.

Mr. Kerrio: I would like to say what was said at that time. He has made remarks about the member for Niagara Falls and he wants to have it on the record.

Mr. Bradley: That's right.

Mr. Kerrio: I want to read what was said. If I can't, I shan't; it's up to you to make the decision, Mr. Speaker. But I would like to read into the record something that is quite important:

"I would like to take a most responsible position as I relate my feelings to this bill. I suggest to those assembled that the injured workers of Ontario certainly deserve the support of the legislative body here, and I'm the first to suggest that that's uppermost in my mind."

Mr. Germa: Then you voted against the bill.

Mr. Kerrio: Then I went on to explain: "I ... cannot support this bill, for a ... good reason."

Mr. Laughren: You speak with a forked tongue.

Mr. Kerrio: Mr. Speaker, it only related to who was going to pay. It had nothing to do with what that member said and what the member that moved the bill said.

Mr. Bradley: They are masters of distortion.

Mr. Kerrio: I have to make the point very clear to this assembly that I supported their bill in principle.

Mr. Laughren: No, you didn't.

Mr. Kerrio: I was only relating to the fact that they did not care who had to pay.

Mr. Laughren: Your friends are going to pay. That is what bothered you.

Mr. Kerrio: I reinforce that position now. I would prefer that they would make their points without referring to the member for Niagara Falls.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kerrio: You guys ruined the country you came from and now you are over here trying the same damn thing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order!

An hon. member: You stand condemned with your own words.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the honourable member for Dovercourt continue?

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege, would you please invite the member for Niagara Falls to withdraw the statement which he has just mentioned?

Mr. Bradley: Do you mean you've got the gall to ask him to withdraw after the non-sense here tonight?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I'm sorry, I did not hear the honourable member for Niagara Falls.

Mr. Kerrio: I will repeat it. You ruined the country you came from and you are trying to do the same thing here.

Mr. Laughren: That's the point. Are you going to let him say that, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Kerrio: What is wrong with that statement?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the honourable member for Niagara Falls withdraw?

Mr. Kerrio: What, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Germa: The offensive statement.

Mr. Kerrio: The country they came from is in dire trouble because of the socialist activities over there.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the honourable member withdraw?

Mr. Kerrio: What?

Mr. Laughren: Let him say it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The comments that you just made in regard to the member who has just spoken.

Mr. Kerrio: I don't see anything wrong with the statement I made.

Mr. Laughren: Let him say it. It's valuable on the record.

Mr. Kerrio: Let it go on the record.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will ask the honourable member once more to withdraw.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, could you specify exactly what it was that the member said that you find offensive.

Mr. Lupusella: It is really clear what he said. He should withdraw it.

Mr. Laughren: You've given him his ultimatum.

Mr. Bradley: You are great pitchers and lousy catchers over there.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we might calm this entire proceeding down just a little if we were to allow the honourable member for Dovercourt to complete his remarks briefly and then proceed to clause by clause.

Mr. Laughren: No, the member was given an ultimatum.

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Speaker, before I am going to continue with my remarks, again I would like to invite the chair to invite the member for Niagara Falls to withdraw the statement because it was really offensive.

Mr. Kerrio: I don't see anything offensive about it. The socialists have ruined your country. What do you want me to say?

Mr. Lupusella: You didn't say that.

Mr. Bounsall: You are castigating all of Italy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I asked previously if the honourable member would withdraw the remarks he made.

Mr. Kerrio: There is a little misunderstanding here, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Laughren: No, there isn't.

Mr. Lupusella: It's very clear what you said.

Mr. Kerrio: I am suggesting that the socialist government has ruined a great country in Italy.

Mr. Laughren: That is not what you said.

Mr. Kerrio: They have done the same thing in Britain. And I am suggesting that the socialist movement is attempting to do the same thing in Canada. If you take that as a personal insult and you would like me to withdraw directing that to any individual, Mr. Speaker, I will. But I will make the statement and I will say it standing in my place that you socialists have ruined every jurisdiction you have ever touched.

Mr. Warner: You have ruined Niagara Falls.

Mr. Laughren: What are the Liberals doing to Canada?

Mr. di Santo: Mr. Speaker, on the point of privilege, just for the record, the member for Niagara Falls said before that he had supported the bill on principle with some specifications.

Mr. Bradley: Write to the newspaper.

Mr. di Santo: Not everybody is able to write to a newspaper.

Mr. T. P. Reid: No, that's the problem.

Mr. Gregory: You have your own.

Mr. Kerrio: You sure made your points with the people you want to and in the wrong way. Now it is coming out.

Mr. di Santo: On that point of privilege, I would like to submit that the member said that he voted against this bill.

Mr. Kerrio: Clean up your act.

Mr. Lupusella: I was really immersed, in my mind, on the context and within the context of this particular bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I thought the member was speaking further to the point of privilege.

Mr. Lupusella: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nixon: He's continuing his speech.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Mr. Speaker, could I address myself to the point of privilege? I made some remarks earlier about the fact that the privileges of the members seemed to be almost nonexistent in this House. It was my impression that an actual point of privilege was in fact where something was said or done that impugned not only a particular member, but also had a reflection on all members of the House.

These are the privileges that were designated as a result of his or her being a member of this House, the traditional privileges from our British heritage and through our House of Commons in Ottawa and our parliamentary tradition in the Ontario Legislature. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that your predecessor in the chair only 10 or 15 minutes ago ruled that in fact what had been said was an honest difference of opinion.

I would submit quite frankly that what my colleague from Niagara Falls has said is simply his opinion. Perhaps he doesn't have the benefit of having a newspaper or some media organ to make his opinions known, but certainly he is as entitled to his opinion about what is going on here as is the member for Downsview. I would suggest if my friends from the NDP had any concept of what they were about, they would be attacking the government and not the Liberal Party.

Mr. Laughren: There is no difference. We know that and you know that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Previously I asked the member for Niagara Falls to withdraw the language he used in regard to another member. I believe he withdrew that.

Mr. Kerrio: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I was calling him to order because he was using what I felt was insulting language. Since that was withdrawn, I will now ask the member for Dovercourt to continue.

Mr. Bounsall: Just further to the point of privilege—

Mr. Breithaupt: It is over. The Speaker has ruled on it.

Mr. Bounsall: On a further point of privilege then.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: What is the further point of privilege?

Mr. Bounsall: I would like to point out that in the withdrawal of his remarks he indicated that Italy was ruined by the activities of the socialists. I would like to point out for historical reasons that Italy has never been governed by the socialists but rather by the right-wing Christian Democrats for years.

Mr. T. P. Reid: We are all very interested in yellow bird's opinions but they are no more relevant than anything else he has ever said in this House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Will the member for Dovercourt continue in regard to this bill?

Mr. Lupusella: Thank you. I really don't understand what the Liberal Party is talking about, nor do I understand what the member for Niagara Falls is talking about. As my colleague emphasized just a few seconds ago, the Christian Democrats have been ruling Italy for 35 years.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Are you supporting the Red Brigades? Is that what you are saying?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would like to inform the members that the House is now considering the workmen's compensation bill. If the member for Dovercourt continues on the principle of that bill, I will not have to call grave disorder for a few moments.

[9:45]

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege again: I should use your indulgence because the Liberal Party tonight is not really keeping its remarks in relation to the bill. They talked about the socialists and the Christian Democrats—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. Eaton: Ignore their interjections.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, would the honourable member please be seated. That's not a point of privilege. Would the honourable member continue on the bill.

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Speaker, would you please invite the member for Rainy River to withdraw the statement which he made just a few minutes ago?

Mr. Bounhall: About us being in support of the Red Brigades.

Mr. Laughren: Make him withdraw it. That's not proper.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the honourable member continue with Bill 126.

Mr. Laughren: On a point of privilege, the member for Rainy River suggested that the New Democratic Party was supporting the Red Brigades. That is false and misleading and he simply must withdraw that remark.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, he didn't. He asked a question.

Mr. Laughren: You cannot allow that to happen in here. He's not allowed to say that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I appreciate the comments made by the member for Nickel Belt. I did not hear those comments.

Mr. Laughren: It's all going to be in Hansard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will certainly look tomorrow in Hansard and see if they were made.

Mr. Laughren: Fine, we will take it up tomorrow.

Mr. Lupusella: I hope the Liberal Party tonight is going to contain its remarks and you are going to keep those members under control.

Mr. Gregory: Why don't you get on with the bill, for heaven's sake?

Mr. T. P. Reid: Do you notice that they feel they can say anything and not be—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lupusella: Getting into the main principle of this particular bill, I emphasized previously that the government really didn't use the right approach to reflect the economic and social needs of injured workers through each clause of this bill. I can understand why. I can also understand the position of the Liberal Party. I can also understand the position taken by the Progressive Conservative Party in 33 years of this government. The fact is that both parties are supporting the interests of employers in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Bradley: What a distortion.

Mr. Lupusella: That's why certain members sitting on that side, on the right side of this House, are really taking two stands when they are talking about injured workers.

Mr. Breithaupt: Put it in the paper.

Mr. Bradley: That's not on the principle of the bill.

Mr. Lupusella: Of course they want to support them, but on other side they don't want to upset employers.

Mr. Laughren: Try a little harder.

Mr. Lupusella: The Liberals cannot have it both ways, nor can the Progressive Conservative government.

Mr. Kerrio: Certainly you can have it both ways in this country. You can have all the advantages on both sides. How else can you have it?

Mr. Bradley: Another pile of socialists.

Mr. Lupusella: That's why the clauses contained in Bill 126 do not reflect the problems or the needs and this particular bill won't solve the problems of injured workers in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Kerrio: Thank the good Lord for what you've got here.

Mr. Lupusella: Just to give an example, the increase in the cost of living since 1975 up to 1978 has been 30 per cent. What is contained in this bill? Just 25 per cent. The Progressive Conservative government and the Minister of Labour are giving injured workers just a 25 per cent cost of living increase. By the way, for so many years members of this party have been inviting the Minister of Labour to incorporate a particular clause in the bill which would reflect a scale to incorporate the cost of living increase through an automatic formula in order that injured workers do not have to confront the police force in the province of Ontario to try to convince the government that they are really seriously hurt by the way they are living.

What happened in the past? I'm sure the Progressive Conservative government is aware of it. In 1975, when they introduced a bill to amend the Workmen's Compensation Board Act to increase the previous injured workers' pensions, they came out with a big fanfare. They were going to increase pensions about 60 per cent—and what happened? That's the theory that should be taken into consideration. That's the kind of theory which is not contained in Bill 126. We easily understood why they came out with the big fanfare because big figures were making sense in the media; big figures were convincing the general public that injured workers are not really facing economic hardship when the Minister of Labour and this government are saying that the ceiling is going to be increased from $12,000 to $16,200.

Hon. B. Stephenson: From $12,000? It's not going from $12,000 to $16,000, it's going from $15,000 to $16,000.

Mr. Lupusella: Let me ask the Minister of Labour, how many workers in the province of Ontario in 1978 are making 16,200 per year? I'm sure she is making particular reference to a particular group of workers. Maybe she is talking about the plumbers and the electricians. How many plumbers and electricians do we have in the province of Ontario? Maybe we have 2.5 per cent plumbers of the total labour force in the province of Ontario.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I don't think so. It is more than that.

Mr. Lupusella: We might have 2.5 per cent of electricians in the total labour force in the province of Ontario. Those are the workers making more than $16,200 per year. What is she going to do about other workers making $8,000 per year or $9,000 per year? Are they going to get the fat figure of $233.66 per week? The government cannot fool us. Maybe it can fool the public by emphasizing those particular figures, but it cannot fool the New Democratic Party, because in Ontario we have 65 per cent of the total labour force not organized by the trade union movement and they are not making $16,200 per year.

So what is the minister talking about? Why is she emphasizing this particular principle that injured workers in the province of Ontario shouldn't face any particular economic hardship because from now on any worker who gets injured is going to get good money from the Workmen's Compensation Board? That's an indirect message that she is trying to portray to the public. That's what she's trying to do to convince the public that the real situation of injured workers is not based on those figures.

Mr. Makarchuk: You tell them, Tony.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That is not true. You are incomprehensible, as a matter of fact, as usual.

Mr. Lupusella: Let's go back to those people who are making $10,000 per year. In Ontario we have 300,000 workers making $2.65 per hour. Would the minister please tell us how much they're going to receive from the Workmen's Compensation Board when they get injured?

Hon. B. Stephenson: It's in the act.

Mr. Lupusella: Why doesn't she tell us how much money they are going to get when the Workmen's Compensation Board is going to offset a percentage of their partial and total disabilities? Why doesn't she tell the members of this Legislature, instead of fooling the public with those big, fat figures when, in fact, she is giving a big fat zero to injured workers in the province of Ontario? That's what you are doing.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Not only are you incomprehensible but you can't add and you can't multiply either.

Mr. Lupusella: That's why I emphasize the principle that Bill 126 is not solving the problems of injured workers in the province of Ontario.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I didn't say it was.

Mr. Lupusella: I hope the minister will get this message and I hope she is going to understand it. Otherwise, the minister should resign, because she won't be able to cope with solving the problems of those people who are most affected by the cost-of-living increase.

The minister shouldn't be resentful when we say that she does not understand, or she doesn't want to understand for philosophical or ideological reasons, the problems of injured workers; she is trying to diffuse the main problems of injured workers and the kind of life which they are living in Ontario.

Both the Progressive Conservative Party and the Liberal Party should appreciate the great contribution made by workers to the growth of this province, instead of paying $800 when a person dies on the job. That's the kind of generosity given by the Workmen's Compensation Board and by this government: $800 for those people who are leaving their lives in the work place.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That's misleading.

Mr. M. Davidson: It is not misleading.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Yes, it is.

Mr. M. Davidson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker: The minister has just said that my colleague made a misleading statement. I would ask her to withdraw it.

Mr. Kerrio: You have been doing that all night.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Speaker, if I may, the specific statement of the honourable member was that when a workman dies, $800 is paid. That is one small amount of what is provided on the death of an injured workman, and it is misleading to leave that kind of impression with that kind of statement.

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Speaker, speaking to the point of order—

Mr. Gregory: Why don't you resign? You should be ashamed of yourself.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kerrio: You'd better enjoy it, because you are on your way out. You are on your way out, you rats. Cassidy and your gang are on the way out.

Mr. Makarchuk: He's hallucinating again.

Mr. Kerrio: You'd better believe it, and I'm enjoying it.

Mr. Makarchuk: I believe it, I believe it, you are hallucinating.

Mr. Kerrio: You'd better enjoy your stay.

Mr. Warner: Have some more LePage's; you might not become unstuck.

An hon. member: Why is the Minister of Labour laughing?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I was laughing at what Vince Kerrio said.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It was drawn to my attention that the honourable minister used the term "misleading."

Hon. B. Stephenson: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the honourable minister withdraw?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Speaker, I said it is misleading to make that kind of statement. Is that unparliamentary?

Mr. McClellan: You have to withdraw it.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Is it? I am asking you a question, sir.

Mr. M. Davidson: Mr. Speaker, speaking to the point of order: In the interjection that the minister made, and I am sure Hansard has picked it up, she did not say what she has just said.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I said, was it misleading?

Mr. M. Davidson: What she said in effect was that the colleague I am referring to, the member for Dovercourt, was misleading. It was direct, Mr. Speaker, and I would ask that she be made to withdraw that remark.

Hon. B. Stephenson: What did I say?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I listened to the honourable minister and if she repeated what she said, as I interpret it, she did not impute a motive; so I will ask the member for Dovercourt to continue.

Mr. Lupusella: She didn't withdraw the statement, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. member: Ask him to check Hansard.

Mr. Kerrio: You guys are really blasting them off tonight. You're going down for the third time.

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour mentioned that I misled the House, and I think that she has to withdraw that statement.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, I did not.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Are you challenging my ruling?

Mr. Lupusella: No, I'm not.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No? Continue with the bill.

[10:00]

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Speaker, can I suggest that the chair check into the record of that?

If I may continue, I really don't understand why the Minister of Labour should be so uptight tonight.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I'm not. I'd just like you to tell the truth.

Mr. Lupusella: I really don't understand it, because she has been emphasizing the fact that I misled this House. In fact, what happened is that I haven't completed my own argument yet, so don't be uptight. Just let me complete my argument.

Mr. Eaton: We've been waiting for that.

Mr. Makarchuk: Loosen your belt, Madam Minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The member has the floor. Please continue.

Mr. Lupusella: Just keep the Minister of Labour under control. I will continue and I will complete my argument.

Mr. Eaton: You've had the chance several times but you keep straying.

Mr. Bounsall: She's been too impatient to-night.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The only people not under control are the NDP caucus.

Mr. Bounsall: Oh, you like your buddies in the Liberal Party, do you? You like the member for Niagara Falls, do you?

Mr. Lupusella: If, again, I may continue. If there is someone who should be uptight tonight it should be the New Democratic Party because we have been waiting for those changes for three years. Doesn't the minister understand that?

Mr. Bounsall: It's all your fault.

Mr. Lupusella: It's a simple principle. I hope that in two or three years' time we won't have to see injured workers holding demonstrations in front of the Minister of Labour's office, or coming to Queen's Park, because the Minister of Labour didn't take into consideration the basic principle which was supposed to be incorporated in Bill 126—to index pensions of injured workers to the cost-of-living increase. I really don't understand that.

Mr. Makarchuk: This is an historic moment. The WASPs are getting it from the Italians.

Mr. Lupusella: That's a very important principle. We don't want to see injured workers confronting the police force. We don't want to see injured workers suffering more than they have done since 1914, when the Workmen's Compensation Board was first formed. We want to see really serious changes. That's why, as I emphasized at the very beginning of my argument, I'm supporting this bill. I really feel sorry for those injured workers—

Mr. Kerrio: Everybody in the House is supporting this bill.

Mr. Lupusella: You shouldn't talk about them, because they will never take your double sense of supporting employers and injured workers at the same time.

Mr. Kerrio: We all want to see the injured workers looked after.

Mr. Lupusella: You shouldn't talk about it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kerrio: Clean up your act. There isn't a better place in the world for the injured worker than right here in Ontario and you know it. Name one place—go ahead.

Mr. Bounsall: Call him to order. Get him out of here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Renwick: The member for Niagara needs a doctor, and perhaps the Minister of Labour would oblige.

Mr. Kerrio: You're a latecomer here; it is getting better all the time.

Mr. Makarchuk: It is a real group therapy session.

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Speaker, will you please keep the member under control? He has been talking too much tonight.

If I may continue with the argument I have already emphasized, the reason the Progressive Conservative government and the Liberal Party are not really concerned about the conditions of injured workers—

Hon. Mr. Norton: Come on, that is not so.

Mr. Makarchuk: They don't give a damn.

Mr. Eaton: All you are trying to do is use them. That's all you're doing.

Mr. Lupusella: I didn't complete my statement yet.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Order. I say to the member for Dovercourt, if he would read the standing orders, he is out of order by being repetitious. I think I have heard that comment at least 16 times.

Mr. Eaton: Insincere, too.

Mr. Breithaupt: He is also attempting to mislead the House.

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Speaker, again, I am always interrupted by certain members—

Mr. Kerrio: If he would only read it into Hansard once.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the member for Niagara Falls please contain himself?

Mr. Kerrio: I certainly will, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Cunningham: Start over again, Tony. Don't let them bother you.

Mr. Lupusella: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I hope you are going to control him.

The main principle I want to emphasize—and I don't have to get into a great explanation why they are against such increases—

Hon. Mr. Norton: We would like to hear the explanation because we are not. We don't believe that crap.

Mr. Lupusella: I am not really upset about that, but I am really upset about the adversary system which is contained in the Workmen's Compensation Board Act. That is why—

Hon. B. Stephenson: But that is not in the principle of this bill.

Mr. Lupusella:—the Progressive Conservative Party, and the Liberal Party, because generally speaking they are supporting the principle of the act—

Mr. Breithaupt: Poppycock.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Absolute balderdash.

Mr. Eaton: What do you call your speech?

Mr. Breithaupt: Then vote against the bill.

Mr. Kerrio: You are really flogging a dead horse, you are.

Mr. Lupusella: Listen to section 8. It will be very educational for a lot of members because some of them don't understand where the adversary system is taking place and where it is legislated through the Workmen's Compensation Board Act. That is why there is this sense of reluctance when we are dealing with injured workers' pension increases to be increased to the point where injured workers don't have to suffer the consequences of economic hardship.

In part I, section 8 of the Workmen's Compensation Board Act—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the honourable member return to this bill?

Mr. Breithaupt: Or any bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I heard the honourable member refer to section 8—

Mr. M. Davidson: Part I, section 8.

Mr. Laughren: He has never strayed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the honourable member continue on this bill?

Mr. Lupusella: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In my preamble I said I am supporting in principle the contents of this bill—

Mr. Gregory: You said that eight times.

Mr. Lupusella:—because I feel sorry about the conditions of injured workers.

I want also to emphasize that the reason this government is not increasing the levels of benefits to the point that injured workers in Ontario shouldn't have to suffer the economic hardships they are facing now lies in the Workmen's Compensation Board Act.

The reason I was given before was based on Part I, section 8 which states that an injured employee forfeits his or her rights to any legal action against the employer, however negligent the employer has been if that employee accepts benefits from the Workmen's Compensation Board.

Mr. Laughren: Cheap insurance.

Mr. Lupusella: How nice for the employer, this particular section which is contained within the Workmen's Compensation Board Act. How can you say the Workmen's Compensation Board is not operating on an adversary system when such a clause is contained within the Workmen's Compensation Board Act.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It has nothing to do with it. Your logic is completely irrational.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Surely that very section takes the adversary role out of it. You're completely out in left field.

Mr. Lupusella: Of course, we have an opportunity from time to time where such a course is not existing in other acts to protect the interest of the employers. Members could see the contents of an article—

Mr. Laughren: Permeates the entire bill and you know it.

Hon. Mr. Norton: That eliminates the adversary role.

Mr. Lupusella:—which appeared in the Ottawa Evening Journal on May 31, 1978. The title of this article is based on the following lines: "Widow of Constable Sues Accused Killer in $350,000 Action." Let me tell you something, Mr. Speaker: If in the Workmen's Compensation Board Act this section of the act didn't exist or hadn't been passed in 1914 by this Legislature, then injured workers could have taken employers to court because this particular—

Hon. B. Stephenson: She was suing the guy who shot her husband. It is a completely different situation.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lupusella: But they can't do it, they can't do it. Injured workers are prevented from doing that because there is a particular section in the act which prevents them from taking legal action against the employer and to request bigger amounts of money in order that their economic needs will be met.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Did your researchers prepare that baloney for you? Your researchers are better than that.

Mr. Lupusella: What's happening is that we have to support, to tolerate—which is a better word—the attitude of the Minister of Labour who, from 1975 to 1978, has been questioned in relation to problems affecting benefits—

Hon. Mr. Norton: You mean you are not blaming her for 1914?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Yes, he is.

Mr. Lupusella: Of course she has to be responsible. She is the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Kerrio: You already read that part of your speech.

Mr. Lupusella: She has been behaving in a very irresponsible way. That's the problem.

We raised issues on the floor of this Legislature in relation to problems, particularly in connection with the pensions of injured workers, pensions which do not allow them to meet their social needs. I would like to report for the record what has happened since 1975 in relation to this issue.

December 16, 1975: I'm quoting the answer to a question which was asked of the Minister of Labour: "I think the question was whether I would give any indication of government action in the direction of increasing benefits. I can give no such indication at this time because this is under study and discussion at the moment."

We are going back to December 16, 1975, and the studies initiated were in relation to the level of pensions which were supposed to be increased. An increase in those benefits was finally made in 1975. But she has been playing this game on the floor of the Legislature since 1975. I think it's really a shame, and that's why the Minister of Labour has to stop playing this double game in the Legislature. When we raise concerns affecting people's lives—and in this case it's injured workers' lives—she has to respond in a very responsible way to the needs of injured workers in the province of Ontario.

I want to conclude my remarks because—

Some hon. member: Hurray.

Mr. Samis: Keep on talking.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bounsall: Carry on. Tell them they're encouraging you.

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Speaker, it seems it's the wish of the House for me to continue my remarks.

Mr. Bounsall: Yes, hear, hear.

Mr. Makarchuk: They will be sorry. They should keep quiet.

Mr. Lupusella: I can continue. It won't be any problem.

Mr. Makarchuk: They want to hear more, Tony.

Mr. Eaton: Just continue saying nothing, as you have been for the last half hour.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order. Would the members of the House please allow the member for Dovercourt to continue?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Why?

Mr. Lupusella: By concluding my remarks—
Interjections.

Mr. Makarchuk: Again! I don't think you should conclude.

Mr. Bounsall: Don't conclude.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Could I ask the member for Dovercourt to ignore the interjections and please continue?

[10:15]

Hon. Mr. Norton: Especially those from his own party.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Tell him to conclude.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Fair is fair.

Mr. Lupusella: I would like to raise in this debate an important problem which members of this Legislature have been emphasizing through the course of this debate and I want to address my remarks through the chair because it seems that the Minister of Labour is hard of hearing.

Interjections.

An hon. member: There's a chair out in the lobby.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lupusella: I hope when the House reconvenes the Minister of Labour is going to introduce legislation to cover the present loopholes which exist within the Workmen's Compensation Act. Injured workers in the province are waiting for changes in each clause in the Act, but the most important change they are looking for is that their pensions should be equal to the cost of living increase through an automatic formula. Then injured workers would not have to face police and demonstrate. This would be a simple right which they deserve; this government should give such recognition on the basis of rights and not on the basis of charity.

Mrs. Campbell: I am pleased to enter this debate and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I'll be brief.

First of all, I support the bill itself. But I feel it is important that the minister understands that I am not prepared—and I speak only for myself on this occasion—

Mr. Laughren: Don't you speak for the member for Niagara Falls too?

Mrs. Campbell: —that I am not prepared to debate a bill of this kind—

Mr. Kerrio: The member for Niagara Falls will look after you rascals.

Mrs. Campbell: —at the dying moments of a session.

Mr. Laughren: Right on.

Mrs. Campbell: The Workmen's Compensation Act needs revision, and it has been crying out for revision for a long time. It is particularly difficult for me to understand how we come almost to the final hour of this session to be told that the money is available to make these payments to people who have been waiting for them for all these years.

Mr. Bounsall: Listen to that.

Mr. Laughren: See, Vince, why she is in the front row and you are in the second?

Mrs. Campbell: I find that intolerable.

Mr. Laughren: Tell that to the member for Niagara Falls.

Mrs. Campbell: However it would be equally intolerable for me at this time not to support the bill, so I do so, but with this caveat which I trust the minister will take into consideration. This is, without question, the last time that I will be prepared to look at a bill of this kind, a bill to amend the Workmen's Compensation Act, brought in in the final hours of a session and without the opportunity to fully debate it—

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Are you resigning?

Mrs. Campbell: —and to deal adequately with the revisions which must obviously be made. Thank you.

Mr. Martel: Mr. Speaker, I only want to speak to one section of the bill.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Why don't you wait until it goes to committee then?

Mr. Martel: Are you here, Darcy?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Damn right and you aren't.

Mr. Roy: Look at the bow-tie, Elie.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martel: Have you been at the Albany Club?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the honourable member continue with the principle of this bill?

Mr. Martel: Mr. Speaker, I am attempting to do so, but it's the member who is interfering.

Mr. Kerrio: See if you can make some sense, Elie. None of the other guys did.

Mr. Speaker: If the honourable member is prepared to address his remarks to Bill 126, I am prepared to listen.

Mr. Martel: Mr. Speaker, I only want to speak, as I said, to one section of the bill, really, and that pertains to that section dealing with the indexing, which isn't there and which we propose to present.

Mr. Nixon: You know what he is implying.

Mr. Martel: Let me finish before the Speaker shakes his head—

An hon. member: It is too late for that because he already has.

Mr. Martel: Let the record show that the government is prepared to bring in tonight three years of increases which they should have done over the last three years. I merely want to remind the government of one point in this bill: that it was this government some years ago—in about 1970—that trooped off to Ottawa, led by the Honourable Rene Brunelle, to demand of the federal government that they introduce in the Canada Pension Plan and the Old Age Security a clause which would index—yes, I am speaking to the bill—which would index—well, Mr. Speaker, there are three years of increases—

Mr. McClellan: That's why the bill is here.

Mr. Martel: —which are now being stacked after three years of terrible suffering—

Mr. Kerrio: It has nothing to do with indexing. It's an assessment.

Mr. Martel: —by many people who in fact are on compensation pensions.

Mr. Kerrio: The Speaker is giving you the benefit of the doubt, Elie.

Mr. Martel: Over the three years, many people have asked this government to move towards introducing an indexing system so that in fact we wouldn't stack it for three years and subsequently bring in increases, as we are doing tonight, allowing that suffering to go on because of a deprivation of income over that three years. I make the point that it was this government in about 1970 which took a troupe of people, led by the minister, to Ottawa to insist on escalating or indexing; and while this government can go to Ottawa and ask for indexing, a government which is charged with a different type of pension dealing with injured workmen—and I have read all the papers presented by the Honourable Rene Brunelle in Ottawa—it is itself not prepared now and wasn't prepared in 1975 to introduce into benefits an indexing system, which would not allow workers to go from 1975 to 1978 without any increase, despite the tremendous inflationary spiral; and that's the argument they presented in Ottawa. When in a position itself and with a responsibility which this government has to introduce indexing, it backs off. As an individual I find it rather difficult to accept that this government would propose and insist that Ottawa introduce indexing at a federal-provincial conference which led to indexing but, when in a position itself to introduce indexing to prevent the deprivation that's occurred to injured workers, is at this late stage still not prepared to do that—

Mr. Deans: Inconsistent.

Mr. Roy: That's what they do. Pass the buck all the time.

Mr. Martel: —and I really find that distasteful to the ultimate.

Mr. Roy: You always pass the buck.

Mr. Martel: I would hope that my friend from Humber (Mr. MacBeth) would say to his colleagues—

Mr. Speaker: Would the member for Sudbury East tell me what section of the bill deals with indexing?

Mr. Martel: Well, Mr. Speaker, over the evening—

Mr. Speaker: I am asking the honourable member a direct question. Can you tell me what section of this Bill 126 deals with indexing?

Mr. Martel: Subsection 1, section 2, Mr. Speaker, which deals with bringing in all of the increases over the three years in one lump sum, and what I want to do is implore this government—

An hon. member: Move an amendment.

Mr. Martel: —rather than try to lump it for three years, to make up for all the suffering that went on because of the shortfall in income in those three years, I am simply asking this government to accept indexing as it went to Ottawa and asked the federal government to do in the Canada Pension Plan and the old age pension scheme.

I find the duplicity of this government unacceptable. They will go to Ottawa and ask the federal government to do it and yet—and the minister conceded this the other day—this government had the revenue over these three years from which to give those workers an increase, but they saved it until this time.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, I didn't concede it for the entire three years.

Mr. Martel: Oh, yes, she did. I find it totally unacceptable that they could go to Ottawa and request that but they are not prepared to ensure that the workers of Ontario, as they face the ravages of inflation, are protected in the same way that they expected those people to be protected under the Canada Pension Plan. I ask the government, and I ask the Minister of Labour as she leans over in dismay—

Mr. Gregory: It's disgust.

Mr. G. Taylor: Don't try to read symptoms.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No. This is just inhuman punishment; that's all.

Mr. Martel: The punishment that the minister has inflicted on injured workers over the last three years has been inhuman, I want to tell her.

Mr. Sterling: Withdraw that statement, Elie.

Mr. Martel: They've had to put up with it for three years as their pension cheques became smaller and smaller. But, of course, the minister didn't feel it. They did. And I am imploring this government tonight to accept and recognize that the only way to overcome that is to allow and to support and to accept the amendment we are about to present, based on the fact that the government did it years ago—

Hon. B. Stephenson: We are never going to get to it this way.

Mr. Martel: We'll get to it. The minister has allowed three years to go by; why should she worry about three hours of debate? The workers aren't going to suffer that much in three hours.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: If they have to listen to you, they will.

Mr. Martel: Yes. And your stooges are taking pictures of them.

Hon. Mr. Kerr: They're not my stooges.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the honourable member have anything new to add to the debate?

Mr. T. P. Reid: He doesn't have anything to add.

Mr. Martel: I simply ask the government, based on the fact that they requested the federal government to introduce indexing six or seven years ago, to be prepared tonight and tomorrow to accept the same principle in this bill so that workers won't suffer as they have in the past three years.

Mr. Kerrio: Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to join the debate on this act, Bill 126, An Act to amend the Workmen's Compensation Act. I would like to bring into the debate some comments as they relate to my feelings about injured workers.

Mr. T. P. Reid: And a little rationality.

Mr. Kerrio: And maybe set the record straight. It's time we in the Legislature took stock. I want to point out to those members on my left the very same thing I pointed out when one of their members moved a bill that I said was irresponsible. And I say it again.

Mr. Deans: But that doesn't make it any more right because you repeat it.

Mr. Kerrio: I say it now with an explanation of the context in which it was made. Even a fireman could understand this.

Mr. T. P. Reid: That's asking an awful lot of that fireman.

Mr. Swart: The working slobs again, eh?

Mr. Kerrio: I would like to say that when we pass legislation here that would look after the injured workers in Ontario, I can't believe there is anyone in any part of the House who wouldn't agree more with that principle. The point I was trying to make, and I will say it again—and I would hope the minister would bring this kind of thinking into the bill that she is putting here today—

Mr. Laughren: You've got a conflict of interest.

Mr. Kerrio: I want to tell you this, Mr. Speaker, and it's a sincere thought that I have; it has nothing to do with who is interested and who is not interested in the workers of this great province of ours.

[10:30]

Mr. Laughren: Open and above board.

Mr. Kerrio: I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, I want to pay every injured worker in this province. I want to pay every widow in this province a fair amount of money—

Mr. Laughren: How much?

Mr. Martel: How much?

Mr. Bounsall: How much is that?

Mr. Kerrio: —in proportion—

Mr. Martel: How much?

Mr. Laughren: How much?

Mr. Kerrio: —to the realistic amount of money that we can pay—

Mr. Laughren: How much?

Mr. Bounsall: How much?

Mr. Kerrio: —generated by this great private sector that provides it all.

Interjections.

Mr. Kerrio: All.

Interjections.

Mr. Kerrio: All.

Interjections.

Mr. Kerrio: Not by some socialist philosophy—

Mr. Martel: He's a great Tory, over there.

Mr. Kerrio: —that would print its own money just to get votes, who bring tears to their eyes and who suggest that they are the only people in Ontario interested in the injured workers, which is the height of hypocrisy.

Mr. Speaker: Would the member for Niagara Falls consider this an appropriate time to adjourn the debate?

Interjections.

On motion by Mr. Kerrio, the debate was adjourned.

Hon. Mr. Norton: I was just beginning to enjoy it.

On motion by Hon. Mr. Welch, the House adjourned at 10:32 p.m.

LEGISLATURE OF ONTARIO

FRIDAY, JUNE 23, 1978

The House met at 10:02 a.m.

Prayers.

FOOD INDUSTRY INQUIRY

Mr. S. Smith: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker: In this morning's Globe and Mail on the front page there was an article which, in the headline and in the first paragraph, suggested very strongly that the Premier (Mr. Davis) has refused some suggestion made to have members of this Legislature sit on a food prices and food trade practices royal commission.

I would like to have the record set straight, because the same matter was then covered in an interview with the Minister of Agriculture and Food (Mr. W. Newman), in which the question asked of the honourable gentleman clearly indicated that the interviewer on the CBC believed that somehow or other was what was suggested and what was turned down. First of all, I want to read into the record, from Hansard, an excerpt from the committee itself. I know that a reporter from the Globe and Mail covered that committee, and I want to read the thing. This excerpt starts on page R-1225-2 of the draft Hansard for June 21.

"Mr. Eaton: To comment on Mr. MacDonald's suggestion that a member from each party be on that committee—

"Mr. Nixon: Not from each party.

"Mr. S. Smith: A nominee.

"Mr. Nixon: A nominee.

"Mr. Eaton: A nominee; that's what he said.

"Mr. Lane: That's not what you said. You said a member from each party.

"Mr. S. Smith: Not a member; a nominee. You might nominate somebody from the food industry et cetera.

"Mr. Eaton: Not a member of the Legislature?"

Mr. S. Smith: Not a caucus member, no. Not even a member of a party.

"Mr. Eaton: That's the way I took it. I was going to suggest what you're saying, that it not necessarily be a member of the party.

Mr. S. Smith: Not even a member of the party.

"Mr. Eaton: Right.

"Mr. Nixon: I don't think it would be proper for it to be a member of the Legislature.

"Some hon. members: A nominee.

"Mr. Eaton: I can accept that idea then."

Mr. Nixon: Good for Bob Eaton.

Mr. S. Smith: Yesterday, in the House during the question period, among other things, I said to the Premier, and again I quote: "I don't particularly think it has to be a member of the judiciary. In fact, it might be of interest to the Premier that the Liberal nominee would be the very person suggested by the Minister of Agriculture and Food, which is Mr. Poole, the counsel of the committee." He is hardly a member of the Legislature.

Mr. Nixon: Or hardly a member of the Liberal Party.

Mr. S. Smith: Later in the debate on this very matter, I said: "Let us be clear: It was never the intention—and this was made clear in the committee—that these would be members of the caucus nor even members of the party. They would merely be people knowledgeable in the food industry and suggested by all three parties." In fact, I suspect there's even a legal reason why MPPs ought not to be on royal commissions.

That having been made so clear in the committee and having been clarified yet again in the House yesterday, I must say I'm a little dismayed. I wish to take this opportunity to set the record straight so that the debate, however it proceeds in the public mind, at least has real facts as its basis.

It may well be, for instance, that the Premier wishes to turn down any suggestion that the members of the royal commission should be those buried in the local cemetery, and he would be quite right in so doing. But that was never suggested. Never was it suggested that MPPs should be on that commission.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Nor was it ever excluded.

Mr. S. Smith: It was.

Mr. Deans: Yes, it was. We specifically said in the committee—

Hon. Mr. Davis: The report doesn't say so.

Mr. S. Smith: I'll send you a copy of Hansard. Do you want a copy of it?

Hon. Mr. Davis: The report didn't say so. When you drafted that report, it didn't say so.

Hon. W. Newman: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to read part of the resolution that was moved by Mr. MacDonald and seconded by Mr. S. Smith: Maybe they didn't intend it to read in the way the resolution came out: "A nominee of each of the Progressive Conservative, Liberal and New Democratic caucuses of the Legislature..."

Mr. Deans: Don't make an ass of yourself. You were in the committee and you heard the answer.

Mr. S. Smith: A nominee by the caucus, because you can't have it by the party. You were there for the debate and you know it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is entirely appropriate for any member of this Legislature, or indeed any party, to get up and correct the record if he feels that what has been said has been misinterpreted. The honourable member has done that.

STATEMENTS BY THE MINISTRY

AID TO ITALIAN EARTHQUAKE VICTIMS

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Mr. Speaker, members will recall that following the disastrous effects of the earthquake of May 1976 in the Friuli region of northern Italy, the government of Ontario responded to the appeal for funds to build housing for the earthquake victims. This response was co-ordinated by the National Congress of Italian Canadians.

To construct the housing, more than $4 million was collected from across Canada. Of this amount, I am proud to say, the government of Ontario contributed $500,000 and a further $1,943,000 came from community support in 21 Ontario cities.

At the beginning of May 1978, a delegation comprising representatives of the National Congress of Italian Canadians; two Canadian federal cabinet ministers, Honourable Norman Cafik and Honourable Monique Begin; Senators Bosa and Rizzuto; Honourable Jacques Couture for the government of the province of Quebec; Ron Tessolin, a member of the Legislative Assembly of Alberta; Joe Piccininni, representative of the city of Toronto; and myself, representing the Premier and government of Ontario, went to formally open the completed housing projects.

I wish to report the funds were used to construct solid, earthquake-resistant, one-storey homes. To date, 92 have been built in Venzone, 59 in Forgaria and 30 in Pinzano. Each home stands on a full basement made from reinforced concrete, with a frame from timber made to flex without breaking should another earthquake strike.

Homes for the aged were also built in Bordano and Taipana which each allow accommodation for 40 people.

The Italian government and people gave their sincerest thanks to the people of Ontario and Canada.

Many Italians who survived the ordeal said to the delegation: "It is a Canadian heaven. It's like a dream. I am really amazed to see Canadians come here and do this. Please say thanks to all Canadians. They have just been wonderful."

In conclusion I wish to report the accomplishment of the original goal of assisting some of the people of the Friuli region in their time of need. As Canadians we can take pride in this project; a unique venture organized by Canadians to help the country of their ancestry, funded by citizens and all levels of government; a tribute to the energy and ability of the citizens of our country.

HEALTH RECORDS

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, on May 26 the honourable Leader of the Opposition asked me a question concerning the hiring by insurance companies of investigators to obtain confidential medical information. I thought I would use this time to reply rather than the time of the question period in order to be fair to the House because of the length of this answer.

As I reported to the House at that time, there was one case last year where an insurance adjuster was involved. The adjuster in question was Mr. Lawrence Lander, and the complaint was received in the office of the superintendent of insurance from the solicitors whose client had been the subject of the investigation. The complaint involved the release of information by a doctor to the adjuster and contained a copy of the complaint and the disposition thereof by the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario.

Both Mr. Landers and the doctor have given evidence before the Royal Commission on the Confidentiality of Health Records.

The complaints committee of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario decided not to lay charges against the doctor among other reasons because he had assumed, wrongly as it turned out, that the adjuster had obtained the necessary consent to the release of this information.

The matter was referred to the health disciplines board which upheld and confirmed the decision of the complaints committee of the college.

A copy of the health disciplines board decision was referred to the Honourable Dennis Timbrell, Minister of Health, on July 11, 1977. It is understood that this matter was investigated by the Ministry of Health and the matter was discussed with the hospital concerned in order to eliminate such errors of record security in the future.

The adjuster confirmed that he had no written authorization from the client, but had asked the doctor to make a report. The report was to be used for assessment purposes, and for the purpose of setting up an injury claim reserve. This was done and the doctor was paid.

The claim was subsequently settled, and the adjuster stated that the report was not used in any way in connection with the settlement.

There was no specific violation of the Insurance Act. However, the adjuster was cautioned that he should not become involved in any way in obtaining medical information without the proper authorization of the person concerned.

The royal commission canvassed this matter with the health disciplines board. As well, the superintendent of insurance released his file to the royal commission of inquiry on March 17, 1978. This matter was raised in the Legislature with my colleague, the Minister of Health (Mr. Timbrell), last November. As I stated previously, there was no investigator involved.

On the question of pretext interviews of accident victims by private investigators, now being reviewed by the royal commission, there was one instance reported this year to the superintendent's office concerning the involvement of insurance companies with private investigators. In that case CIAG retained Centurion Investigations Limited, which have been before the royal commission to obtain a pretext interview of an accident victim. No release of confidential medical information was involved. In this case the claim had not been settled.

The matter was investigated by the superintendent's office and, as a result, the insurer placed a ban on all pretext interviews and all information obtained was turned over to the victim's solicitor. Further, the Co-operators Insurance Company drafted a specific code of conduct for its claims representatives which expressly included this ban. It is also being discussed with the royal commission staff. These instructions were based on the Insurance Bureau of Canada instructions for company adjusters which were adopted for general insurers on March 1, 1977.

The effect is to require all adjusters to fully identify themselves and their interest to any claimants, and specifically to prohibit them from seeking to influence any public officer, official, or servant or employees of any institution by any financial inducement.

In addition, of course, the superintendent of insurance, with respect to proposals presented to the select committee on company law of this Legislature on part XIV of the Insurance Act, has recommended that a uniform code of conduct of claims settlements be prescribed for all persons dealing with claims on behalf of insurers in this province.

I want to reconfirm to the House that upon receipt of the Krever report we will proceed to take appropriate action against any insurance companies or adjusters using, or attempting to use, improper methods to obtain information.

[10:15]

With respect to the supplementary question of the member for Welland-Thorold concerning the Medical Insurance Bureau, I would like to inform the House that the principal function of this bureau is to act as an information exchange office on behalf of member life insurance companies. It does not generate information on any applicant for life insurance but merely acts as a depository of data collected by its members.

The rules of conduct of this bureau aim to preserve the privileged nature of the information it handles. The rules require that a member company give every applicant for life insurance a pre-notice informing the applicant of its intention to make a brief report to the bureau on the information at hand regarding his or her insurability. That is the authorization that the honourable member was speaking of.

The rules also require a member seeking information to obtain an authorization signed by the applicant specifying the company that is to receive the information from the bureau. Information other than the applicant's name, occupation, birth date, and birthplace, is kept in code and is released in this form to a duly authorized insurer. Correspondence regarding medical impairments must be handled solely by the medical director of the insurer. The bureau has pledged to release, upon request from the individual concerned, medical information to the attending physician and other information to him or her personally.

The procedure is aimed at achieving maximum accuracy of personal information by giving the opportunity to the individual concerned to correct any errors affecting the personal record.

MIB is not a consumer reporting agency within the meaning of the Consumer Reporting Act, which is administered by the business practices division of my ministry.

When the act became law in 1974, a review of the operation of the bureau was conducted by the ministry, including a visit to MIB headquarters. As a result, MIB agreed voluntarily to adopt procedures of notification, correction, and disclosure that appeared to be compatible with the requirements of the Consumer Reporting Act.

The bureau was originally established because life insurers, in most cases, had only the information provided by the applicant to rely upon. There were instances where this information was inaccurate, misleading, or incomplete. The bureau was, therefore, established to avoid unwarranted underwriting losses which would have to be offset by charging a higher premium to all consumers.

The superintendent of insurance discussed this matter with the Canadian Life Insurance Association some three weeks ago. The life industry has recently been in touch with Mr. Justice Krever's commission and will be preparing a submission to the commission both on the general problem under review and on the function of the MIB.

I do have some serious concerns. First, of course, the confidentiality of that information; secondly, the implications of having one large repository for all this information in terms of privacy of our citizens; thirdly, I am concerned that although the forms being used by insurance companies appear to be legal, proper, and sufficient to obtain clear consent from their clients, nonetheless, I wonder about the degree to which the public really understands what is happening to their medical information. Accordingly, I will be very interested in the report of Mr. Justice Krever. After receiving it, I can assure the House that I will be conducting further dialogue with the insurance industry and will report to this House on the subject.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

SUMMER RECESS

Mrs. Campbell: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I recognize that it is the rule of this House that one rises on a point of privilege as soon as possible after the event. However, I am rising because of the motion by the government House leader yesterday and I did not actually find the wording of the motion until I took my seat today and looked through Hansard. So I was in no position to raise the point.

The motion by the House leader for the government, which was approved by the House, was that when the House adjourns for the summer recess it do stand adjourned until a date to be named by the Lieutenant Governor by her proclamation.

I would submit that motion is unconstitutional, on this basis: If one realizes that this House is the daughter of Parliament, we recognize that a reigning monarch in England lost far more than his crown by usurping the powers of government, the powers of the Parliament. It has been ruled ever since that the adjournment of a House or the recall of a House is not in the hands of the crown. In this case, we have before us a motion which leaves that matter to Her Majesty's representative in this House. I protest that we cannot so lightly yield our privileges as members.

Mr. Speaker: I don't know whether any other member would like to speak to the point of privilege. I think it's a phraseology often used. In actual practice, it is the responsibility of the governing party and the government of the day to reconvene Parliament.

Mr. Renwick: You never know who that will be around here.

Mr. Speaker: Whether or not the wording of the motion was as the honourable member suggests, I don't think there are any illusions in anybody's mind as to who is going to reconvene this Parliament.

Mr. Renwick: Who is the government of the day?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I've missed you.

COST REDUCTIONS

Hon. Mr. Auld: Mr. Speaker, on April 25, 1978, the Treasurer (Mr. McKeough) announced an expenditure reduction program amounting to $73 million which included a saving of $35 million to be achieved through a decrease in the size of the civil service. I am able to report that good progress is being made on this staffing constraint program.

Prior to this latest move, the government had severely constrained the size of its work force. Therefore, it was obvious that the additional staff reductions would be very difficult to achieve. There is no more slack in the system to cut. Rather, the work force could only be reduced through the elimination of lower priority activities, through greater innovation and productivity and through organizational consolidation where possible.

Because of these considerations, the $35 million reduction target was distributed among the ministries and the ministries were asked to develop a plan for review by Management Board as to how they would meet their target. That process is now complete, with one exception. The Ministry of the Attorney General was assigned a target of $1.9 million. Great difficulty has been encountered in developing a method of making this cut without compromising the administration of justice in Ontario. Therefore, we have decided to conduct a more intensive review of the court administration system and its staffing standards before resolving this one case.

In developing their constraint plans, some ministries have identified expenditure reductions other than staff which could be made with a lesser negative impact on ministry service levels. Where Management Board was convinced that such savings were preferable and would continue into future years, the substitute savings were approved. For the information of the honourable members, I am distributing a detailed tabulation showing all of the expenditure reductions on an annual basis by ministry. You will note that the savings in personnel costs amount to $30.8 million, other savings total $3.5 million, and the situation in the Attorney General's ministry is still unresolved. This means that by April 1, 1979, the government work-force will be reduced by the equivalent of almost $31 million per year with the possibility of further reductions in the Ministry of the Attorney General.

With the completion and approval of these staff reduction plans, the general recruitment freeze announced on April 25 of this year has been progressively lifted. This will allow individual ministries to fill key positions with a minimum of internal red tape. At the same time, we expect recruitment activity to proceed at a diminished pace, as most ministries will be reducing their staff in accordance with their specific constraint plans.

On several occasions, I have explained the new manpower control system now being used by the government. It is based on a comprehensive cost approach with the current size of the work force limited by a global salary and wage allocation to each ministry and future costs controlled by the classified structure ceiling. Within these limits, ministries can and should adjust their manpower mix to achieve maximum results in a changing environment. For example, a ministry could substitute two $15,000 a year employees for one $30,000 a year employee or, alternatively, use the money for several part-time employees. The objective would always be maximum results for limited dollars in relation to changing conditions and priorities.

The staff constraint plans previously described recognize the flexibility inherent in the new manpower control system. We can expect most ministries to change the mix of their staff reductions within the established limits as their plans culminate on April 1, 1979. Thus, it would be pointless to speculate on the number of individual positions that will be eliminated. However, I have no doubt that the 1979 budget statement will show a further substantial decrease in the size of the civil service. When related to an increasing work load as represented by the growing population of Ontario, I believe that this is a clear indication of increasing productivity in the civil service.

In addition to this latest staffing constraint, I must point out that the government has undertaken a series of measures designed to reduce the cost of the civil service. These include:

1. The 1975 budget which announced a staff complement reduction of 2.5 per cent. The savings were estimated at $15 million, and encompassed, at that time, 1,741 positions.

2. On July 7, 1975, the 1975 budget supplementary actions imposed a further cut of 1,500 complement positions in the internal administrative function.

3. The 1976 budget resulted in a further cut of 1,000 complement positions.

4. The 1977 budget provided for no increase in the government workforce.

5. On September 16, 1977, I announced a 2.7 per cent reduction in the salary and wages account for the balance of 1977-1978. On an annualized basis, this reduction would amount to about $35 million.

Besides reducing the size of the civil service, we are making sure that the compensation level as determined by job classifications remains under tight control. We will not permit upward classification creep, a process which gradually introduces more highly-paid positions without necessarily adding to the number of employees. Our record relative to senior management positions is a very typical example. Between January 1976 and August 1977 we achieved a net reduction of 55 executive positions, despite the requirements of a new ministry, Northern Affairs, and a new program initiative, children's services. An additional superstructure reduction program was started in September 1977 that will yield an additional 25 positions.

Thus, the total cut in senior management, such as directors, executive directors and assistant deputy ministers, will be 80 positions. That is a decrease of 10 per cent in the number of positions that existed at the start of the program. According to the June 5 edition of the Toronto Globe and Mail, during that same time period, the number of senior executive positions in the federal civil service increased by 4.4 per cent.

While I am quite proud about our general record in controlling the government work force and, in particular, making a further reduction of $34 million, I must also point out that we are probably at the end of the line in this regard. We cannot maintain an effective civil service if we eliminate all external hiring. We especially need to attract some of the bright young people now entering the work force who can, with seasoning and experience, become the key senior civil servants of tomorrow. In addition, I am quite convinced that most if not all of our programs are now operating at a minimum staff level.

Thus, considering future capability and current service levels, any future staff cuts will have to be related to specific program reductions or eliminations. The potential for general staffing constraints has really been pretty close to being exhausted with this latest initiative.

Mr. Speaker, I have another brief statement in reply to questions 111 to 127 on the order paper.

On June 20, 1978, a total of 17 questions was tabled by the Leader of the Opposition as questions 111 to 127.

Mr. Martel: Is this a filibuster?

Mr. Cassidy: The minister has used up half the question period already.

Hon. Mr. Davis: We want the members opposite to be fully informed.

Mr. Cassidy: It never happens over here.

Hon. Mr. Auld: In reply to all these questions, I have these observations to make.

To begin with, I believe the government has already been most informative on this issue. My reply to question 45 on May 16, 1978, provided a great deal of information on the expenditure constraints during 1977-78. [10:30]

Secondly, it would be quite difficult to correctly interpret and precisely answer the subject questions. When authorized funding is reduced, program managers respond with a number of austerity measures which are usually effective in the short term. Staff vacancies are not filled promptly, for instance, staff training courses are deferred, travel expenses are reduced and so on. Subsequently to tabulate all of these measures and assign a particular dollar value to them is a very great deal of work, would not be very precise and I fail to see the relevance of the whole exercise.

Lastly, it seems to me that the correct forum for an expenditure review of this nature is the public accounts committee or during the estimates review. Both options provide an opportunity to discuss expenditures and any changes that might have or will be taking place. Since the procedures are less formal, the information exchange can be more effective.

CONDOMINIUM LEGISLATION

Mr. Philip: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege. On Thursday, June 15, during the debate on Bill 103, I read into the record certain statements made by people from the Federation of Ontario Condominium Associations who had met with the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations on June 12. In an attempt to discredit these statements, the minister indicated that the other members of the federation who were at that meeting and whom I did not quote were supportive of Condominium Ontario and that the views presented were only the views of two out of 11 members of the federation executive who had met with him. I subsequently discovered that there were, in fact, at most seven members of the federation at that meeting, not 10 or — as the minister indicated, a matter which the minister should well have been—

Mr. Speaker: That's not a point of privilege. Would the honourable member point out to me what privilege of his has been abrogated as a result of that exchange?

Mr. Philip: The minister has indicated some information which was false, and I would like to give him an opportunity to correct the matter.

Mr. Speaker: No, it was the information that he gave as he saw it, and it's the right of any member of this House to do that.

Mr. Martel: He can't count, the poor boy.

Mr. Speaker: There can be an honest difference of opinion, but there is no point of privilege.

ORAL QUESTIONS

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

Mr. S. Smith: Mr. Speaker, I will direct a question to the Premier in the absence of the Treasurer. I am sure the Premier is familiar with the report which the Treasurer tabled which was entitled Youth Employment and the Ontario Economy, and it's a very serious problem which I am sure he and I agree must be addressed. I would make one very brief quote from that report: "Recognition of the problem of large numbers of new entrants in the absence of relative wage adjustments has led a growing number of countries to experiment with direct job subsidy schemes," and it goes on to discuss some of the good points and some of the bad points about these schemes, which are similar to those which we have been suggesting in this party for some time.

What I want to know by way of my question is, will the government act upon this report? The conclusion is that despite some of the undesirable features of these direct job subsidy schemes such as we have recommended, it may be possible to link employment creation to an industrial growth strategy, and they recommend basically that as long as there's a strategy and the thing is used properly, direct job subsidy is a reasonable way to get these young people into the work force and not just for the summer. Will the Premier act on this report according to the suggestions that have been made?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think, Mr. Speaker, the report points out some of the pluses and minuses. I think the Treasurer, in tabling the report, was wishing to inform the members of the Legislature and members of the public of the experience elsewhere and our own experience with the program for the summer months. The government, in terms of employment, in terms of the economy, is always looking for responsible and reasonable ways to resolve some of the problems that we face.

I am certainly not in a position today to say to the Leader of the Opposition that we are going to embark at this point on some new program, but I think the Treasurer has pointed out, as I say, the positive aspects as experienced in some other places and some of the problems that also exist. I am sure the Leader of the Opposition understands that I can't suggest today that we are going to embark upon some new program that might be described as a permanent one.

Mr. S. Smith: May I ask what the Premier does have in mind for what I would suggest is the number one problem we have in front of us, which is how we are going to accommodate the 200,000 young people every year who are coming out of our educational system and will be doing so until that population bulge goes through the system?

Surely the Premier knows as well as anyone else the serious social consequences of having these people unemployed. We have suggested a direct job subsidy; the report seems to say that on balance, carefully done, it is worth trying. Other countries have done it. Why is the Premier so hesitant to move on to this, and when can we expect some action for what is really an emergent and present problem?

Hon. Mr. Davis: We are aware of the problem, but I think there are other matters that have to be considered. The honourable member's colleague was there for parts of the discussion—it isn't by any means a complete solution but I think it is related to it—at the conference or discussion period that was held at Seneca with respect to the matching of employment opportunities to skills.

I think there was a recognition at that conference that while there are a number of young people coming into the labour force, there are certain occupations or trades where there is still a requirement for people. I think there has been a tendency, and this was expressed at the conference, for young people—partially because of parental influence, partially because of our social structure, whatever way one may wish to describe it—to tend to move to some occupations or professions where the job opportunities are not as great.

Some of the recommendations at that conference will be helpful to us—when I say "us," I mean to those responsible; this includes the educational institutions, the trade union movement, and government—in that some of these young people can and should be encouraged to move into those areas where job opportunities quite obviously exist today and where the potential for them in the future in number terms may be somewhat greater.

I would also say, with respect, that while there are a number of matters that might be considered—and this province has not been reluctant to take the initiative in some fields—if there were to be a permanent program as exists in some western European countries, which quite obviously have a somewhat different structure, one really should anticipate this being done by way of a national program. I am not saying this means the provinces shouldn't or cannot do it. I am just saying that if it were to happen, in my view—and I think I am right in this—it should be done on a national basis. If it weren't done on a national basis, we could get into the difficulty that, if we were to embark upon such a program, would we put domicile in as a prerequisite of eligibility for the program? I think the Leader of the Opposition knows my views on that subject; I expressed them yesterday. I think we would all be reluctant to see that sort of thing emerge as being a precondition.

While I don't question the validity of the concern of the Leader of the Opposition, I am just pointing out that the solutions aren't quite that simplistic. I think a lot of things have to be considered. No one is debating the numbers coming into the labour force; I think, though, that there are other solutions, partial solutions, that have to be considered by all of us when we approach the problem.

Mr. Sweeney: Supplementarily, Mr. Speaker: In the Treasurer's report, he clearly indicates that he is dissatisfied with the distribution of funds to the two ministries of education with respect to job creation and job orientation. What does the Premier intend to do with respect to those two ministers and that particular comment of the Treasurer?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think there has always been this ongoing discussion. The honourable member, who is an expert in this field himself, understands the traditional differences of opinion that have existed. Perhaps it is easy for someone who isn't as directly involved to make that sort of observation. Perhaps the member wasn't there for the Friday morning discussions when a number of people, including some from other than the university community suggested it would be unfortunate—I think that was the phrase used—to say to a person who wanted to pursue, shall we say, an academic career in honours history, that he should be precluded from doing that, and there was nothing wrong with a skilled tradesman having a degree in honours history.

I know that is a bit of a contradiction in the minds of some people, but I think we would all be reluctant to say there isn't some benefit in terms of a general education—and I use that word general rather than liberal education, which is the academic phrase, even though the person might not use that specific general education in their occupation. I think this is the area that has been discussed. It is not new, it is not different. There are those who would argue that there should be far greater emphasis on the technological courses and on the two-year programs at our community colleges. As one who debated with the former leader of the Liberal Party the whole concept of the community college and the decision by the government to really orient the community colleges to the technical, vocational, technological courses, rather than—as I think I recall his suggestion of it being—primarily a two-year entrance general arts program for admission ultimately to the universities, as the junior college system in some states of the Union, I think the wisdom of that decision is now perhaps becoming apparent to the former Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Nixon: The Premier is wrong in his assumption, but rather than interrupt his flow any more, we will let it go. He is absolutely wrong.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the question has been adequately answered.

Hon. Mr. Davis: This was the view shared by the Toronto Globe and Mail at the time, as a matter of fact.

Mr. Nixon: The then Minister of Education would not even let the education committee discuss it.

Mr. Speaker: A new question.

Hon. Mr. Davis: That's not right.

Mr. Nixon: The Premier just presented us with a package based on Hawaii and Florida, as I recall.

Hon. Mr. Davis: On a point of personal privilege: based on California, Florida and New York state, but not Hawaii.

Mr. MacDonald: No personal privilege, it is a difference of opinion.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I never went to Hawaii—until a year ago. When I did go—

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition with a new question.

CITY STATUS FOR BOROUGHS

Mr. S. Smith: I will address another question to the Premier, again in the absence of the Treasurer. In view of the fact that the mayor of North York and the mayor of Scarborough have both recently written to the Treasurer reiterating their request that their present boroughs be granted city status; given the fact that the Treasurer has said that he will not consider this unless it is part of a much larger package to do with Metropolitan Toronto as outlined in his white paper; and now that the white paper has in fact been shelved and the proposals have been shelved is the Premier prepared to ask the Treasurer to use the authority he has under section 148(a) of the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto Act to grant city status for the boroughs of North York and Scarborough who have requested it and for that matter for the remaining boroughs who may desire it?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I understand the Leader of the Opposition has introduced a private bill related to this matter. I haven't the dates of the Treasurer's reply to the mayor of North York or the mayor of Scarborough. I think it was really anticipated that if legislation had been introduced in the past week or so, and it was obvious that no consensus had been achieved on some issues, that probably that matter would have been dealt with.

Mr. Speaker, I am a very reasonable, flexible individual; I have had this request made to me, I am not sure whether it was by the mayor of Scarborough or not, but I certainly have by the mayor of North York on previous occasions. I have never said it will never happen. I am quite prepared to take a look at this in conjunction with my colleague, the Treasurer, but the Leader of the Opposition will understand that if I cannot give a commitment on this today, he will not press for some answer before 12 noon on a particular date.

Mr. S. Smith: By way of a brief supplementary, accepting that the Premier may want a little time to consider the matter, may I ask the Premier if he would consult with the Treasurer in view of the intention of North York, for one, to introduce some changes in terms of civic buildings, crests, stationery and so on, all of which could amount to some considerable expense, if there is going to be a title change in the near future? And, similarly, since the whole package has now been shelved at the request of the government, could the government indicate any reason why it would not proceed with something as simple and straightforward as this request?

[10:45]

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I think that if North York is at that stage in its administrative procedures where large new orders for letterhead and other matters are being made part of the budget, if there is a significant expenditure involved I will chat with the Treasurer and make sure the mayor of North York is given a decision. That much of a commitment I can give to the Leader of the Opposition.

AUTO PACT

Mr. Cassidy: I have a question to the Premier relating to the discussions he has been holding over the course of the last three or three and a half months with the presidents of the major automobile companies, with people from the parts industries and most recently with the United Automobile Workers Canadian district. Can the Premier now report to the House what specific steps the automobile companies are intending to take in order to give Ontario and Canada a fair share of automobile production, investment, employment, research and development, and of production in the parts sector of that industry?

Hon. Mr. Davis: The honourable member's question is somewhat fortuitous. I was going to ask permission of the House to revert to statements. There will be two statements. Mine is very brief, then the Minister of Industry and Tourism (Mr. Rhodes) wishes to make some comments. I can either ask permission of the House to revert for these brief statements or I can answer the question, which would really be just reading my statement.

Mr. Cassidy: On a point of order, we would like to revert to statements.

Mr. Speaker: Do we have agreement to revert to statements? Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I know the member for London Centre wants me to be brief. I just wish he would exercise the same self-discipline on himself.

Mr. Peterson: Not now, all the time.

Hon. Mr. Davis: That's his third new suit this week.

Mr. Laughren: Stop playing games.

Mr. Havrot: You guys are the greatest game players in the world.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would only say to the member for Nickel Belt that unlike his party we don't play games over here, but we don't take ourselves as seriously as they do either. We take our jobs seriously but not ourselves; something they might learn.

Mr. Speaker: Could the Premier begin his statement?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will.

Mr. Laughren: You take the Speaker seriously sometimes.

Hon. Mr. Davis: On a number of occasions during this session questions have been raised and points of view expressed about the state of the auto industry in Canada and, in particular, about the effects of the Canada-US auto pact on that industry. During those exchanges I indicated that cabinet members and civil servants were involved in a series of discussions with spokesmen from the auto and auto parts manufacturers as well as representatives of the auto workers. I also indicated I would be prepared to make a statement to the House when these discussions were concluded.

Our last meeting was held on Monday of this week. I shall, therefore, be tabling today—and I will do so immediately—for the information of all members a background paper on the automotive products industry, which contains not only a summary of the information acquired at the discussions held to date but also expressions of our attitudes and concerns about future prospects and developments.

Members will be aware that also within this week the federal government has announced an extensive study of the auto industry and the auto pact to be undertaken by Mr. Simon Reisman, former Deputy Minister of Finance in Ottawa. This new development will undoubtedly lead to further meetings and discussions and, hopefully, decisions and action. Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, I shall ensure that the House is kept informed of these matters.

Finally, as I mentioned, I should note that the Minister of Industry and Tourism has been involved in a series of ongoing discussions with his counterpart in the federal government. I believe, with the acceptance of the members of this House, if the statement period could be extended the Minister of Industry and Tourism should make his statement now; and then I'll endeavour to answer whatever questions the leader of the New Democratic Party may have. He may wish to direct one of them to the Minister of Industry and Tourism.

PLANT LOCATION INCENTIVES

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: I'm not aware of whether the copies of this statement have been delivered.

Mr. Cassidy: Yours has, but not the Premier's.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Fine. On the matter of government incentives for new investment in the automotive industry, I regret to inform this House that discussions with Ottawa have resulted in no new proposals. As recently as this past Wednesday, I was hopeful that a joint federal-provincial approach could be developed to allow us to influence the location of a major new automotive project which would have resulted in 2,600 new jobs in this province. However, Ottawa seems to have become so preoccupied with issues other than those affecting the economic well-being of this country—

Mr. Peterson: You are getting down in the gutter with the rest. This is silly. Get your sights up. Who wrote this, the Premier?

Hon. Mr. Rhodes:—that the federal government is incapable of determining, let alone taking, the necessary action.

Hon. Mr. Bernier: Listen to your friends in Ottawa.

Mr. Peterson: You are getting cheap.

Hon. Mr. Davis: You should know what they are up to.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Late last February the Honourable Jack Horner, Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, contacted me to ask whether Ontario would participate on a 75 per cent federal-25 per cent provincial basis in offering a $30-million cash grant to the Ford Motor Company of Canada to locate a $500-million engine plant in this province. He told me that the $30 million was estimated by Ford to be the difference in the investment costs in locating this new facility in Ontario as opposed to a northern United States state.

At the same time, I was informed that the federal Department of Regional Economic Expansion, together with an agency of the Quebec government, would be offering approximately $80 million on about the same 75-25 basis to General Motors of Canada to locate a $400-million aluminum casting facility in Quebec.

At that point in time, this government had not formulated a policy on Ontario's role in major incentive proposals and, consequently, a response to Mr. Horner was deferred. While the matter was being considered, it was learned that Ottawa had gone ahead and made a $30-million offer to Ford without Ontario participation. Since an immediate Ontario response was no longer necessary, we decided to take a broader and deeper look at the Canadian automotive industry and future investment prospects. Studies in both my ministry and TEIGA were initiated and meetings with the major firms, the APMA and the United Auto Workers were convened by the Premier. At these meetings, several firms told us of substantial and broad-reaching incentives being offered by most northern states in the United States to attract new investment.

The APMA presented its case for government assistance at this crucial time in the industry's development. Virtually all of those consulted deplored the use of subsidies to lure new investment, but at the same time confirmed that incentives were an important factor determining the location of a new plant.

While these consultations were in progress, officials from the federal departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Finance met on May 26 with Ontario officials to discuss the main features of an automotive investment incentive program then under consideration in Ottawa. The program being contemplated was specifically designed for non-DREE designated areas of the country and would provide assistance amounting to one-third to one-half of that available under DREE. In other words, the program was designed to maintain a substantial regional development incentive, while at the same time providing a measure of support for automotive investment location in regions such as southern Ontario. It was suggested that provincial participation in the program might follow the 75-25 per cent formula proposed in the Ford offer.

As a result of our studies and meetings with the industry, we had come to the view that some Ontario participation in automotive investment incentive schemes was necessary, particularly in view of the importance and timing of the investment programs presently being considered by the industry. Our principal concern, however, related not to competing with Ohio, Michigan or New York, but with our sister provinces. It would, in our view, have been counter-productive for us to get into a bidding war with other provinces. Thus, we concluded that a federal program with provincial participation would be preferable to separate competing provincial programs.

On June 6 the Treasurer and I met with Messrs. Chretien and Horner in Ottawa to discuss automotive investment incentives and in particular, we thought, the federal proposal which had been discussed among officials. Much to our surprise, the federal ministers made no mention of this proposed program. In any event, we informed Messrs. Chretien and Horner that if a federal automotive investment incentive program were developed, it would have Ontario's support and participation.

Last Friday, June 16, senior executives of Ford of Canada met with me to inform me of a new development in the planning of the $500-million engine plant and to request Ontario's support for increased assistance. Ford was now planning to expand an existing engine facility rather than build a totally new facility and the investment cost differential had increased to $75 million, that differential being between the expansion of an existing plant in the United States as opposed to a new facility in Ontario.

We were told that if the Canadian incentive offer could be increased from $30 million to $75 million there was a good chance that the facility could come to Ontario. We were told that Ford executives had met the previous Wednesday, June 14, with ministers in Ottawa and had made the same request for increased assistance. The Ford representatives were told that Ottawa support would depend on Ontario's reaction.

The Ford request was considered by cabinet here on Wednesday, and it was decided to inform Ottawa as follows—this is quoted from the Telex sent to Mr. Horner:

"The position of the Ontario government with respect to incentives for new investment in the automobile industry in Canada is as follows:

"1. That Ontario will participate with the federal government on a 25 per cent provincial/75 per cent federal basis in an investment incentive offer of $75 million to Ford of Canada for the proposed V-6 engine plant in Ontario;

"2. That this type of offer not be limited to Ford of Canada but be available on a comparable basis for other employment-creating automotive investment projects in Ontario; and

"3. That Ontario participation be limited at this time to a total of $50 million."

Mr. Deans: God, you'd wonder that Ford couldn't afford these things by themselves.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: Yesterday afternoon, Mr. Horner telephoned to advise me that the federal government would increase its offer to Ford to locate in southern Ontario only if the federal contribution were matched on a one-for-one basis by Ontario.

Mr. Kerrio: They got that ratio from Bob Welch.

Mr. Deans: It's truly sad when we've got to subsidize Ford Motor Company.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: In other words, the federal government would increase its contribution from $30 million to $37.5 million only if Ontario would also contribute $37.5 million. It is no longer a three-for-one proposition; it is now one-for-one.

The main reason given for the apparent change in federal attitude was concern over the size of the federal grant in relation to normal DREE assistance.

At least one other province apparently felt that it would no longer have a sizeable enough additional subsidy available under DREE to entice auto firms to locate outside of Ontario.

In the case of Ford, it is not a question of Ontario versus another Canadian province; it is Ontario—Canada—versus a US state. I am very much afraid that the Ford plant will now be lost. This government remains prepared to participate with the federal government on a 25 per cent basis in any program designed to assist new automotive investment in Ontario, however large or small the project.

Mr. Martel: We should start our own industry.

An hon. member: We should buy $75 million worth of their state.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: If Ottawa is not ready to go forward on that basis, Ontario on its own must use every means within its power to ensure that in future prospective new automotive investments, and particularly those of the size and importance of the Ford engine plant, are given every opportunity and encouragement to locate in this province.

Mr. Deans: Boy, do we need a reassessment of the way things are going.

PLANT LOCATION INCENTIVES

Mr. Cassidy: I'm rather bowled over by this, Mr. Speaker, and I must say I deplore the fact that the Premier apparently intended to read this into the record after the last question period for three months rather than before.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege, that is totally untrue and unfair.

Hon. Mr. Welch: That is not true.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: He said the opposite.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The final meeting was held with the UAW on Monday. The discussions with respect to the issue mentioned by the Minister of Industry and Tourism had been going on until about an hour ago, with my own involvement late yesterday afternoon. This document was prepared as rapidly as possible. To suggest that this has been delayed for two or three weeks, or two or three months, is just totally erroneous.

Mr. Bradley: Wrong again.

Hon. Mr. Davis: He suggests we were waiting until after the question period. We were working on this to have it here at 10 o'clock. I told our House leader that I was sure the members, knowing their interest, would not object to reopening the period for statements so that it could be made this morning and the honourable member would have an opportunity to discuss it. In fairness, we couldn't have done much more to expedite it.

Mr. Foulds: Cease and desist.

Some hon. members: Apologize.

Hon. Mr. Welch: His editorial comments always get him in trouble.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, now that that point of order is out of the way, I would like to ask the Premier, in view of the fact that the Ford Motor Company is seeking to hold Canada and Ontario to ransom for this particular plant, will the government table all of the information and studies in order to confirm or not to confirm Ford Motor's contention that that rich company can only come into Canada on the basis of the kind of subsidies that they are seeking, in particular view of the fact that the Treasury's own figures have indicated that our corporation tax in this province, and a number of other costs that Ford Motor would have to bear, are lower and not higher than in those competing US jurisdictions?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I am intrigued by what appears to be the position of the leader of the New Democratic Party. I must confess that it wasn't clearly enunciated to the House, but in some exchanges we have had here—and I think I overheard some of his members—none of us want to get into the incentive business.

Mr. Deans: That's right.

Mr. Mancini: That's what he said.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think it was apparent to us that in the discussions—
[11:00]

Mr. Mancini: That's what he said in Windsor.

Hon. Mr. Davis: —if it became a case of either it happened or didn't, I sense something other than total rejection by some members opposite. They can check Hansard. I may be totally wrong and, if so, I will apologize, but I don't think I am.

Mr. Foulds: Just table the document.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The studies have been tabled.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would say it is not a question of producing studies. Check Hansard. I stand to be corrected. I have been wrong before and I shall be wrong again, but I am sometimes right. I am not here to explain or defend the Ford Motor Company of Canada. I should point out to the leader of the New Democratic Party, fortunately, or unfortunately—in this case, in my view, unfortunately—the decision on this particular investment will not be made by Ford of Canada. The decision will be made by Ford—whatever its title is—

Mr. Deans: Doesn't that tell you something about our branch plant economy?

Mr. Swart: It's an international cartel that is involved.

Hon. Mr. Davis: That's fine. Go ahead. You can interject all you want. If you want to know what I know about it, that's fine. If you don't, then I'll sit down. It is as simple as that. I am trying to help as much as I can in telling members what the situation is.

What we found in the past short period of time, as the Minister of Industry and Tourism mentioned, was that the government of Canada on its own had offered Ford Canada $30 million.

One can argue whether they should or should not have. It was a judgement they made. There have been discussions about provincial participation. There is no question there is an offer on the table in some respects for General Motors under the DREE proposal, for a plant not too far distant from the city of Montreal, which we find just a shade difficult. One could understand it in some other geographic areas of the province of Quebec, but locating it around the city of Montreal is not as easy to explain. That is in limbo. I can't inform the honourable members just what is happening.

Mr. Foulds: Answer the question.

Hon. Mr. Davis: With respect to Ford—and members can debate the figures—Ford has been saying to the government of Canada and saying to the government of this province within the past two to three weeks the decision will probably be as to whether it be a totally new plant or the extension to an existing facility it presently runs in one of the neighbouring states. The differential in terms of their capital costs for either the extension or the creation of a new facility in the province of Ontario is estimated to be in the neighbourhood of $75 million.

Mr. MacDonald: Do you believe that?

Hon. Mr. Davis: The member for York South asks do I believe it. I can't get up in this House and say I am an expert on construction costs.

Mr. MacDonald: Get your experts.

Mr. Speaker: Just ignore the interjections, please.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am relatively satisfied that the head of Ford Canada, with whom the member may not agree and may not like—my guess is he probably doesn't even know him—

Mr. Deans: I know him.

Mr. MacDonald: I know that the Premier knows him.

Hon. Mr. Davis: —is anxious to get whatever capital investment he can in this country. I don't believe he is coming in to con the government of Canada or the government of Ontario.

Mr. MacDonald: Perhaps you are too easily persuaded.

Hon. Mr. Davis: One can argue whether Ford generally has met the obligations under the pact, but I am one of those who believes that Mr. Bennett is making a genuine effort to get this facility. He comes in and says their best estimates indicate that in terms of construction costs, and in terms of those other capital costs that will be required, whether it is a new plant or an extension, the differential is in the neighbourhood of $75 million. I would point out to the leader of the New Democratic Party this does not take into account any incentives from a particular state where they have given incentives in the past. We don't know whether they will give them again or not. This request from Ford Canada was on the basis of their actual differential in terms of physical location here or in the United States.

We are reluctant. We met with the UAW. I think it is fair to state—and I don't think they mind being quoted—that they are not in support of an incentive program. I guess philosophically the members opposite in the Liberal Party might not be enthusiastic. We are not enthusiastic. The New Democratic Party isn't enthusiastic because it is the wrong kind of incentive program.

I am the first to say to them that I don't think any of the major automobile companies need this sort of assistance. I don't think they need it.

Mr. Deans: That's absolutely right, but you keep giving it to them and they keep coming back.

Hon. Mr. Davis: That's fine. Our responsibility here as a government, knowing they don't need it—

Mr. Deans: It's robbery.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am not going to go so far as the member.

Mr. Deans: It is.

Hon. Mr. Davis: That's fine. He can say it's robbery. He can say we shouldn't do it.

Mr. Deans: It is.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The chances are with the change that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in Ottawa has now communicated to us, the opportunities on this particular facility appear to have diminished. He can say it's wrong.

Mr. Deans: It is.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Our responsibility, nonetheless, is to see what we can do to create jobs.

Mr. Deans: As long as you give in to it they will keep coming back.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Order.

Hon. Mr. Davis: That is a responsibility we have. It is fine for you to say, but what we are faced with is fairly significant competition from other states of the union. We are faced with competition—

Mr. Deans: As long as you are going to enter into that kind of nonsense, you'll always be responsible.

Hon. Mr. Davis: That's fine. I understand—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The answer has developed into a statement and response to interjections. I will hear a supplementary.

Mr. di Santo: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: The honourable member for Ottawa Centre I think has just had an original question. I don't think he has had a supplementary yet.

Mr. Cassidy: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to say that I think it is time to take the gloves off with the companies—

Mr. Speaker: Question.

Mr. Cassidy: —which are among the richest, most powerful—

Mr. Speaker: Question.

Mr. Cassidy: —in the continent coming with their begging bowls to the Ontario government.

Interjections.

Mr. Cassidy: Has the Ontario government carried out any studies about those comparative costs in order to measure Ford's claims? Has it analysed figures which have been given to it by the Ford Motor Company? If so, will the Premier make those figures public in order to show that is an incredible claim they are making and that it is simply blackmail by the Ford Motor Company to try to get $75 million from the governments of Canada and of Ontario?

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I really think the language of the leader of the New Democratic Party is very inappropriate.

Mr. Martel: You free enterprisers have been giving away the store for years.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Check Hansard.

Hon. Mr. Davis: What I have tried to explain to the honourable member is that as a government we are not enthused about incentives. I said this long before he did, as a matter of fact. In fact, I was surprised at some of the observations coming from some of his colleagues. We made that position clear months ago. That point of view has not changed. Members opposite may not care about job opportunities but we have a responsibility. To suggest that this is a case of blackmail is just totally irresponsible.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: That's right.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Ford Canada—and I will say for the president that I can disagree with him on some issues, we can disagree on figures, we can disagree perhaps on Ford's commitment or the way the figures work out with respect to the auto pact generally, we can disagree on all of those things—we agree on some—but one thing I am not prepared to let go by is a suggestion that the head of Ford Canada is not anxious and making every effort to locate this facility in Canada.

Mr. Lawlor: He's an employee.

Hon. Mr. Davis: He is a Canadian. He is faced with a board south of the line which will be making a judgement based on economic considerations. That is part of their responsibility. That decision may relate to a cost differential without incentives from any state of the union, the differential being in the neighbourhood of $75 million.

Mr. Warner: The auto pact is pretty useless, isn't it?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Of course we have assessed that $75 million. I am not in a position, nor is the Minister of Industry and Tourism in a position, to say that figure is right down to the last decimal point. I am not. I am relatively confident that it is reasonably close.

Mr. Cassidy: Then table the figures.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I think we are talking about a fair amount of money if Ford Canada is able to go to their head office and say, "The cost in Canada in terms of the development of the facility is now roughly equivalent to that which we would face in the United States."

That happens to be the issue. The government of Canada in its wisdom has already committed itself to $30 million. The problem we face in this is that we felt it was to have been a three for one. Horner now says roughly 50-50. We are insisting as well—I would hope the members opposite who happen to represent the Niagara Peninsula understand this—that this should be available to any automotive development, if this is to be the policy, anywhere in this country. I am in favour of regional development. I understand the differences. I know that there are regional disparities, but I think there is a certain degree of equity involved in this situation particularly when the potential for job loss also may exist in the peninsula.

That's why paragraph two was in the letter to Mr. Horner yesterday. We wanted to make it clear—and I hope those people opposite understand and appreciate it—that if this is to happen that opportunity is to be available to the St. Catharines area, GM or anyone else. Those people opposite haven't done this. We are attempting to resolve it in a way that is equitable for everyone.

Mr. Martel: You've given the resources away; now they want the cash.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martel: You've got nothing else to give them, so you give them cash.

Mr. Speaker: Order. You're just wasting the time of the question period.

Hon. Mr. Davis: What would you do?

Mr. Kerrio: Now you praise the UAW.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Why don't you people just say you are totally opposed? We'll understand. We don't like it either.

Mr. S. Smith: Given what I consider the gravity of this situation; given the fact that what was portrayed to us as a decision—

Mr. Germa: Question.

Some hon. members: Question, question.

Mr. Hennessy: Tell them, Stuart, tell them.

Mr. Havrot: Fight them.

Mr. S. Smith:—given the fact that what was apparently a difficult decision between whether to subsidize or not was resolved first of all, according to the statement, unilaterally, by the federal government who made the $30 million offer—

Mr. Germa: Question.

Mr. S. Smith:—and then the ante was apparently upped by the Ford company—once the game was entered into, they then raised the stakes; then given the fact that this government seems to have decided that it's a game that, reluctant as it is, obviously—and I agree with you—it has decided it's a game it had to enter into—

Mr. Germa: Question.

Mr. S. Smith:—and now given the fact that there seems to be a problem with regard to the interpretation of DREE and the inter-provincial rivalries—not in the Ford case but in the GM case—

Hon. Mr. Davis: That is not what I said occurred—

Mr. S. Smith:—which is that once we start on this slippery slope towards allowing corporations to make these decisions to locate in our country or not, based strictly on their head office preferences due to financial situations rather than on the market—

Mr. Speaker: I still haven't heard a question.

Mr. Foulds: And it's been one minute and 15 seconds.

Mr. S. Smith:—rather than on any obligation, would the Premier consider that this is a matter of very great urgency and importance and assist us in some manner to act in concert?

Mr. Germa: Question, question.

Mr. S. Smith: For instance, would he consider some way we can deal with this over the summer? Would he be willing to meet with our Treasury and industry critics in both parties, brief us on what he knows about the matter, discuss the implications with us? Because we should act in concert if at all possible on this very serious matter.

Mr. MacDonald: Question. What are you doing?

Mr. Makarchuk: He has got a problem. Harold Greer didn't get a chance to work on it.

Mr. S. Smith: Can we expect therefore that the Premier will share information with us to enable us to support whatever stand the government eventually feels it is necessary to take?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I can assure the honourable member that we will share to the extent possible whatever information we have. We're in the process of doing it. We're sharing it with the House within hours after we ourselves have received it. To suggest that over the summer there could be some meetings or action in concert—we're faced with the immediate situation of Ford. Ford will know what is the position of the government of Canada and ourselves. That decision will probably be made fairly soon.

There is no question in my view—and I shouldn't be defending the government of Canada, much as the member for London Centre would like me to—I sense they are reluctant to get into this sort of situation. After one or two discussions, my impression is that this is really the reason for the appointment of Mr. Reisman. I don't think there is any question that is the approach they wish to take.

Mr. Cassidy: He was appointed to sell the store completely.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Listen, the honourable member can be cynical about it; we can question it. But I have to tell the member that I think—and I'm only giving an impression—that the government of Canada is taking this route as a possible alternative to getting into this subsidy business. If Simon Reisman comes to us and says, "What are your views and what information do you have?" et cetera, maybe the leader of the New Democratic Party won't want us to but I'll tell him right now that we will present our views, we will present our information and we will make a very strong case for what we think should be done.

Mr. Cassidy: So will we.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would say to the Leader of the Opposition that some of his caucus members are interested in the GM situation. My information is that that is somewhat in limbo at this precise moment. I can't tell the Leader of the Opposition just what may or may not happen.

Hon. Mr. Welch: The same rules should apply for St. Catharines as apply for Montreal—the same rules for everyone.

Mr. Deans: Don't you realize that it is never-ending?

Hon. Mr. Davis: This is what we attempted to do in our reply. The GM thing is on the table because of DREE; it's there. I'm not going to quarrel with incentives related to regional disparities but we're talking about pretty significant issues.

[11:15]

I would be quite prepared to share whatever I can. I can't share that which is given to me in confidence, nor can the minister. We're dealing with a pretty complex issue and one where I just re-emphasize—it's been stated by the minister, myself and the Treasurer on a number of occasions—that we think it is not good business to get into it. But at the same time, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deans: I agree.

Hon. Mr. Davis: All right.

Mr. Deans: Then what does the government do?

Hon. Mr. Davis: We're faced with it.

Mr. MacDonald: The government has been involved in it since Confederation.

Hon. Mr. Welch: If we sit back and do nothing we get criticized by members opposite as it is.

Mr. Deans: You don't have to sit back and do nothing.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Ask Pennsylvania and Ohio what they've been doing. They get it all, and you complain all day and maybe all night.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have expended 35 minutes of question period and we're not finished the third question yet. I'm sure there are many important questions that honourable members would like to place, since this is the last day. I have two answers of some urgency from the Ministry of Health. I would implore all members, whether they're asking the question or answering it to keep their answers or their remarks brief if we're going to share equitably the 25 minutes that are left in question period.

A supplementary, the member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Laughren: A supplementary to the Premier: Does the Premier fully comprehend how dearly it has cost us to have his Treasurer taking one position and his Minister of Industry and Tourism another position on this matter of incentives? Does he understand, as well, that the real issue here is fair share; particularly in view of the fact that the Canadian share of the North American retail market is around nine per cent, whereas our share of value added is 6.9 per cent, employment 8.4 per cent, investment 5.4 per cent and we have virtually no share of the research and development funds? Does the Premier fully comprehend now what his cabinet has cost us by allowing the federal government to unilaterally take a position without full consultation because of a split cabinet?

Mr. Havrot: Nonsense.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Hogwash.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the honourable member on occasion, makes relevant points. That really is one of the silliest he has made in this House in a long, long time; it really is.

Mr. MacDonald: That is a matter of opinion, not fact.

Mr. Breaugh: If that is such a silly point, where is the Treasurer?

An hon. member: He's not here.

Mr. Warner: No wonder he is not here.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Whatever positions this government has taken have not in any way prejudiced the potential of capital investment by the automotive industry, whether it be the "big four" or the parts industry. Nothing we have done has prejudiced that. Everything we have done, Mr. Speaker, has been directed towards getting a portion of that investment—

Mr. Deans: For years the government has done nothing.

Hon. Mr. Davis:—and I am relatively confident that over the period, we will get it. What we're debating now is really one specific capital plant location; and the member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Laughren) can say he disagrees; I understand it.

Mr. Cooke: What is the auto pact about?

Mr. Breaugh: Where is it?

Hon. Mr. Davis: We don't like it. It was done on the basis that if we didn't participate, the potential was that this roughly $500 million investment—2,600 jobs—would be located geographically somewhere else, that was a reality. I know members opposite don't like to face realities but we had to. The government of Canada had put $30 million on the table; and in our wisdom—and members can question the wisdom—we said for this particular situation, we would go three for one but as a condition of that, because of the potential of General Motors and others, it would have to apply to others as well.

Mr. Cooke: What is the auto pact all about?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Members may disagree with it if they want, but don't start talking about our motivation, don't start talking about any division of opinions because that is totally irrelevant and totally erroneous.

Mr. Laughren: Your government has never had its act together.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: You guys are sucking wind and you know it.

Mr. Laughren: There is the problem right there.

Hon. Mr. Rhodes: You are gasping for air; you are a dying breed, socialism is dead.

Mr. Speaker: The member for London Centre.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I have a three-part supplementary which I think is important to this question. I would like to know from the Premier what other options, what other arrows and a quiver of possibilities he could have used, as an executive of this government, to put pressure on the auto companies without getting into the subsidy game, knowing full well all the risks of that? I would like to know what other options he used, what kind of moral situation and what other kind of legislative devices he contemplated using?

Secondly, I want to know in what form that money is going? Is that going to be strictly in cash or in a provision of services?

Thirdly, I'd like to know the very specific and direct commitment from the auto companies, not only in terms of jobs but also payroll, taxes, balance of payments; effect on the auto pact and, specifically in economic and human terms, what is it going to do for this province?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I recognize the business or accountant's perspective to this particular question. I must confess I can't answer it all. I would suggest that if the honourable member, who has greater ability in this field, were to answer this question himself for himself he would then maybe share it with me.

Mr. Peterson: I would know before I made a decision.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Dealing with the third part of the member's supplementary, we are dealing with one particular plant where the estimated capital investment is in the neighborhood of $500 million. The estimated employment level is 2,600 workers. If the province's participation were one quarter of $75 million, which is around $18 million, I would suggest if the honourable member would calculate the retail tax on construction materials for a $500 million investment—he might be able to calculate how much of it is construction and how much is equipment—if the member were to calculate the provincial sales tax on construction material, if he were to calculate the economic benefits of having X hundred employees involved in the construction of that $500 million facility, if he were to calculate the payroll for 2,600 employees over a minimum five-year basis at X number of dollars per week and what the retail sales tax and the income tax would be, my guess—and I am only guessing—is that the net revenues to the economy of Ontario, if that's how he is looking at it, would substantially exceed $18.5 million.

Mr. M. Davidson: What about the rest of the question?

Hon. Mr. Davis: That was the third part of the question.

Mr. Makarchuk: Supplementary: In view of the fact that discussions are going on right now regarding the establishment of an engine plant for the agricultural equipment field, would the Premier consider giving the three-for-one type of assistance to the agricultural implement industry, should they plan to establish an engine plant in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Davis: This is where we are very reluctant to get into the question of subsidies. This is the problem I have raised publicly. You get into it in the automotive industry and you can perhaps develop this rationale. What the honourable member is asking is does this incentive then apply whether it's agricultural equipment or anything else. The answer to that obviously has to be no. This is one of the reasons we don't want to get into it.

I am not going to try to fool anyone. I never have. There is a $30 million bill on the table. There are 2,600 jobs and there is the possibility of locating this plant. There is GM, where we want to be in a position to compete. We don't want any advantages over the province of Quebec. We don't want them to have any for us. We want an equitable sort of approach to it. Those two are there, particularly Ford. That's fine.

Members can say we shouldn't have said to Mr. Horner that we will go three for one, I understand that. I have got to tell the member that I have a few people who are members of the UAW who may agree in philosophical terms with that. They also might like a job. That's the sort of thing we have to decide. That's where it becomes a little more difficult; that's why in opposition the answers sometimes appear to be very simplistic, and I appreciate that. We also have the human factor as well as the economic factors to consider.

Mr. Cassidy: I want to return to the same subject with the Premier. I want to ask a question of the Premier which arises out of both what he has said, and also the background paper which he has tabled in the House which I have had a chance to look at briefly.

The Premier's statement indicates that over the next 18 to 24 months the automobile companies will be making decisions effecting about $60 billion worth of investments, and therefore of jobs. I want to know whether the Premier and the government endorse the concept, as our party does, that this province and this country should have a fair share of production and of jobs in the automobile industry; that there should not be a trade deficit and that we should have a fair share proportionate to our share of consumption of North American cars and trucks. Is that the government's position as well? If so, what specific steps is he intending to take in order to make that a reality?

Mr. Cooke: Why should we have to pay for it?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I wonder where the honourable member has been for the past several months?

Mr. Peterson: Roller skating.

Hon. Mr. Davis: We have been saying these things. We have been working to attempt to resolve these things. We have been meeting with the companies.

Mr. Warner: You have a very bad track record with nothing to show for it.

Hon. Mr. Davis: We are the ones who initiated the pressure on the government of Canada.

Mr. McClellan: You have nothing to show for it.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The leader of the New Democratic Party knows that the ultimate resolution to this, because of the international nature of it, does lie with the government of Canada.

Mr. Laughren: They had two different positions, too.

Hon. Mr. Davis: It was this government that prodded them into taking some sort of action. Of course, we are seeking—I don't know whether the term "fair share" is the right terminology; I don't get hung up on semantics like the leader of the New Democratic Party. We want what is right for this country; I want what is right for this province. I have made a particular pitch to the automotive companies in terms of research and development, because I don't think we have had a fair share or any share. They know that, I have made it abundantly clear.

Mr. Laughren: Get your ministers together then.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Before I sit down, I just wish that the honourable leader of the New Democratic Party would look at Hansard of Friday, March 8, at his own observation and that of the member for Hamilton East (Mr. Mackenzie), and just see whether he didn't by implication suggest we should be in the incentive business.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Oh, but that was three months ago. That's different.

Mr. Cassidy: Supplementary: Did the Premier receive any specific commitments of any nature at all from the automobile manufacturers or the parts producers about improving their performance within Canada; and is the government now prepared to make public its analysis of by how much those companies are failing to live up to the fair-share concept as far as Canada is concerned?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am sure the member has the figures from the UAW, which has done an analysis of this; he already has those. The government of Canada has produced certain figures; we have produced certain figures. We can spend hours and hours and weeks and weeks debating figures. What we have to do is to find answers, and the answers are not as simple as the leader of the New Democratic Party would suggest.

We are endeavouring to get, not in terms of a commitment in that sense of the word, because I don't know what it means; what we are endeavouring to do is to see that some of the capital growth that is anticipated takes place, that the jobs that already exist are maintained in a secure way; and as I say I have made a particular point with the companies in the field of research and development, because there's one place they can't argue with me since they have not made that sort of commitment or investment in the automotive business in this country. They don't deny it.

I don't know whether they are going to react to this sort of thing or not, but we are trying very hard. I think it is important not only from an economic but from a sociological point of view as well.

Mr. Laughren: You should get McKeough and Rhodes together.

Hon. B. Stephenson: They are not apart.

Mr. Kerrio: Supplementary: Is it the Premier's understanding that the auto pact was really to accommodate the automobile manufacturers so that they could, in fact, take advantage of building engines here and bodies there, and trade across the border without too much inconvenience? If that was the case, and since there has been such an imbalance for so long, I wonder if we wouldn't be wise in suggesting to the federal government that it is time we threw the auto pact out and went back to protecting the workers in Canada by the tariff method?

Mr. Mackenzie: If would end the automotive industry.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I don't want to get into this, but I think the member will find that if he has any constituents who work in any of these plants he should raise that with them. I won't, as I have done facetiously on one or two occasions, intimate that what the member for Niagara Falls has suggested has become the official policy of the Liberal Party of Ontario. I don't think as a party they would support that. I think the member would find that we would be in relatively serious economic difficulty.

Mr. Cooke: Supplementary: I would like to ask the Premier just simply why should we have to pay the auto companies in this country to live up to an auto pact they agreed to? Why should the province of Ontario or the federal government have to pay them to live up to the pact?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Your leader was asking for it three months ago. Your leader was asking three months ago why we didn't.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Of course, we get around to a debate, and this is part of the current discussion that is going on. This is why the government of Canada has now gone the route it has. I just wish they had started this a year ago or two years ago.

Mr. Laughren: You might have provided some leadership there. You have provided no leadership.

Hon. Mr. Davis: There is a debate in terms of the companies as to whether or not—we are all aware of this—within the terms of the auto pact, as companies, they are meeting it. As I read some of the figures, a lot of the imbalance is with respect to parts; and I am not getting into that sort of questionable debate either. I would say it is not a question of why should we give money if they are not going to live up to the pact. We are faced with a practical, real problem; and that is a certain company is in the process of making a significant decision that involves the potential of a lot of jobs.

It is fine for the members opposite to say: "Beat them over the head. Club them. Do whatever you can." But, I have to tell them, that just might not work.

[11:30]

Mr. Cooke: That's not what we are saying. They are beating us over the head right now.

Hon. Mr. Davis: That may come as a bit of a surprise to the members opposite: It might not work.

Mr. Mackenzie: Your private enterprise system isn't working either.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I have to say to the honourable member—I guess he does things his way, although I sense it is not the way he gets elected locally—he can suggest things he wants to in this House; we will do things our way. They may differ.

Mr. Laughren: Which way? Your way or John Rhodes' way?

Hon. Mr. Davis: If that is a supplementary from the member for Nickel Belt, I have to assure him that not only is there great consensus on the approach to this issue between myself and the Minister of Industry and Tourism, but he just has to look at what his own leader and the member for Hamilton East have said with respect to this particular issue and what he is saying today; he will think they are totally different, and they are.

Mr. Laughren: Deal with your own cabinet.

Mr. Renwick: The cabinet is split right down the centre.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Quit while you're behind, guys.

HEALTH RECORDS

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Mr. Speaker, last week the member for Oshawa asked a question concerning confidential medical records from Wellesley Hospital. Several hundred sheets of paper containing medical records from the hospital were found blowing around a parking lot at Sherbourne and Richmond Streets on the morning of June 12.

In answering the honourable member's question, I would like to refer to the present legislation covering the manner in which hospitals handle patient records, outline what the hospital itself has done to prevent such a mishap from recurring and what my ministry is doing to further minimize the possibility of a similar slipup happening at other hospitals in the province.

Also, the Krever commission is currently looking into the confidentiality of hospital records and has already held a special hearing into the Wellesley Hospital incident.

In the Wellesley case, the records found in the parking lot were copies of records kept by the hospital. The copies were in the process of being disposed of when the mishap occurred. They had been placed in plastic bags, and the hospital is of the opinion they fell from a garbage truck hauling them away.

The distinction between copies of records and the actual records themselves is an important one, because the current regulations under the Public Hospitals Act do not cover disposable materials of this kind; that is, duplicate or extra copies of records. The regulations deal only with what he termed the formal medical records of the hospital or photographic copies made for a permanent record.

Section 43 of regulation 729 under the act requires that the hospital administrator make out and keep a statutory declaration setting out the facts concerning the disposal of permanent records. In this case I am advised there has been no contravention of the Public Hospitals Act or its regulations, but obviously the Wellesley case shows there is a loophole in the regulations. To cover this, officials of my ministry are drafting a letter which will go to all hospitals telling them to treat copies of medical records in the same way they would treat their official medical records and asking them to review their procedures for the safeguarding of such records.

Officials at the Wellesley Hospital, I have been advised, combed the site on June 12 and 13 and attempted to ensure that they retrieved every single record that was retrievable. To ensure such a mishap is not repeated, they have temporarily halted disposal of such records. They have issued a circular to all hospital departments asking that the patient's identity be removed from all types of records before records are sent for disposal, and they are developing a policy and procedures manual which will address the whole subject of confidentiality and disposal of medical records.

Finally, I have directed officials of my ministry to work closely with the Ontario

Hospital Association to prepare a set of guidelines for all hospitals covering the handling and disposal of medical records. These guidelines will provide a consistent approach to this matter until such time as we are able to take advantage of the extensive and thorough investigation currently under way by Mr. Justice Krever. We will be looking to that commission's recommendation as the basis for a long-term solution to the serious and difficult problem of maintaining confidentiality in our health care system.

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could be given a supplementary on that response. The minister pointed out the unique loophole in the law about copies as opposed to original records. I heard him indicate that he is prepared to write to them, to prepare guidelines and all that; but I did not hear him say that he is prepared now to make regulations which would close that loophole. Is he prepared to do that?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: I think that would be unnecessary at this point. We will direct them to treat the copies in exactly the same manner as permanent records, and I think that will cover it until we get the report, probably later in the fall, from the Krever commission. Then we can make the long-term changes as necessary, through either legislation or regulations.

Mr. Breaugh: A further supplementary on that: I really don't know why the minister is not prepared to move to the regulation stage now. Would it not be true, no matter what kind of letter or guidelines the minister sent out, there would still be no validity to any argument that any law has been broken should copies be released in this manner or in any other manner? Isn't the basic problem the fact that the law does not require them to address themselves to copies of medical records?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: I'm one who believes one passes a law if there's some resistance to a less formal route. I have no reason to believe from the discussions between my staff and myself with people in the hospital community that there will be any resistance at all. I don't think we should constantly keep rolling in new regulations. I think we can do it on a voluntary basis. I don't foresee any problem that way.

PREMIUM ASSISTANCE

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: The second question I'd like to answer came from the member for London Centre on June 15. He asked—and I'm paraphrasing, I believe—why don't we reveal to an applicant for temporary premium assistance the upper limit of his financial status which would preclude his being eligible for temporary premium assistance. I hope that's accurate.

The formula used for granting temporary assistance incorporates the applicant's present income, liquid assets and number of dependants. This information is provided by the applicant on the original application. With regard to the factors taken into consideration, a resident may apply for temporary assistance based on the immediate financial need due to unemployment, illness, disability or financial hardship. The factors under which an application will be considered are clearly requested on the application for temporary assistance.

The practice up until now has been for OHIP to advise an applicant whose application has been refused that he may have it reviewed by the OHIP management committee. OHIP did not advise the applicant that he could appeal to the health services appeal board.

On June 5, 10 days before the member raised the question, I directed the staff of OHIP to ensure that all insured persons were advised of their rights to appeal under section 24 of the Health Insurance Act. I have been advised by my officials at OHIP that there were very few refusals—about one half dozen a month—that the OHIP review committee had turned down.

In future, applicants whose request for temporary premium assistance is denied will be advised in writing by OHIP of their right to appeal to the health services appeal board. Applications for temporary assistance which are initially turned down from here on in will automatically be reviewed by the OHIP review committee before the above-mentioned notice goes to the individual concerned about the health services appeal board. We'll cut out a step of delay for the individual applicant.

Mr. Peterson: I understand they have a right to appeal under section 24. I appreciate the fact that the minister has cleaned up the procedure in informing applicants of their rights. But clearly that's not the issue. Would the minister not agree with me that the issue is that there are no set guidelines and there are no rules against which they can appeal. How can one present one's case to the review committee if one does not know what the upper limits of income or assets are, be it liquid or otherwise?

If the minister checks with the Attorney General (Mr. McMurtry), clearly there is a denial of justice if people don't know the rules against which they can appeal. Isn't that the issue?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Each case is judged on its merits.

Mr. Peterson: How do you judge the merits without guidelines?

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: One could take six illustrations of a family of four and come up with a completely different mix of assets, mortgages, outstanding debts, et cetera. Each one is judged on its merits. It's a matter of substantiating need. I point out to the member again very few are turned down; it's something in the order of six a month.

Mr. Peterson: Wouldn't the minister agree with me this leaves this quasi-judicial procedure to the whim or the predisposition of the review board? The rules are not nearly enough clear. It's far too discretionary for an applicant to have real justice in the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: No, I wouldn't agree at all.

WASTE DISPOSAL

Mr. G. I. Miller: I would like to address a question to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the public apprehension and concern over the matter of liquid industrial waste and the need for immediate action, will the minister reconsider his position and set up a task force which could study the matter over the summer and bring in recommendations for action no later than this fall?

Hon. Mr. McCague: That question was asked by the critic for the NDP the other day. I said I didn't see that there was any necessity for a special task force. We are looking into that. I have had discussions with the member's leader, who happens to endorse that kind of a situation; I am meeting with the leader and with the critic of that party to discuss some of these issues. I'm surprised the member didn't check with him before he asked that.

MEAT PACKING DISPUTE

Mr. Ziemia: A question to the Minister of Agriculture and Food: Given that under ordinary conditions when a company goes on strike its main competitor will rush out and do the business that the struck company cannot do, and given that Canada Packers did not do this when its main competitor, Swift's, was at this disadvantage—in fact Canada Packers locked its own workers out and stopped doing business as well—would this suggest to the minister that there is a Canada Packers-Swift meat cartel? Is he prepared to bring this cartel before our food industry inquiry to investigate how it affects the producer and the consumer?

Hon. W. Newman: The answer to that question is no.

Mr. Speaker: The time for oral questions has expired.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Darn!

Mr. Breithaupt: Darn! Have a good summer. Saved by the bell.

Mr. Cassidy: On a point of order, I just want to ask the Premier and the House leader, since the matter of the auto pact is of such importance, whether they will agree by agreement between the House leaders that within a week of the House resuming its sessions in the fall we can have a special one-day debate on the auto pact and that all of the information—

Mr. Speaker: That's not a point of order. You had an opportunity to ask that during question period.

PETITION

MINISTRY OF THE ENVIRONMENT ANNUAL REPORT

Ms. Bryden: I have in my hand a petition signed by 20 members of the Legislature requesting that the latest annual report of the Ministry of the Environment be referred to the standing committee on resources development for consideration and report when it meets on resumption of sittings in the fall. I hope the minister will undertake to prepare material for this consideration over the summer, particularly on the question of liquid industrial waste, which has reached crisis proportions. Mr. Speaker, would you like me to read the petition?

Mr. T. P. Reid: No.

Mr. Speaker: It is sufficient to present it to the table.

REPORTS

MINISTRY OF LABOUR

Hon. B. Stephenson presented the annual report of the Workmen's Compensation Board for 1977; the interim statement of the Advisory Council on Occupational Health and Occupational Safety, November 1, 1977-March 31, 1978; the annual report of the Ministry of Labour, 1977-78; and the 1976-77 report on the status of women crown employees.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I wonder if I might make a brief statement about the report of the status of women crown employees, which I am depositing today with the Clerk. I had hoped to have this report earlier this year, however, I think the honourable members will realize that a fair amount of time and work had to go into developing this report again this year. Additional copies of the report and the appendix will be available from the women crown employees office within the next few weeks.

I'd like to take this opportunity to outline several changes in the organization and operation of the women's programs, the most significant, of course, being the elimination of the position of executive co-ordinator. Experience has shown that at this stage of the program's development a senior co-ordinator is really no longer necessary and resources from that office have been distributed between the women crown employees office and the women's bureau quite effectively.

With the elimination of that position, a number of other changes were required as well. For example, the women crown employees office is now responsible for preparation of this report, in close co-operation with the central agencies of government. Formerly, the executive co-ordinator represented the government of Ontario on the Status of Women Council. That responsibility is now fulfilled by the director of the women's bureau.

The Deputy Minister of Labour is now the ex officio member of the Civil Service Commission, replacing the executive co-ordinator in that role. The Affirmative Action Council, which formerly reported to the executive co-ordinator, reports now to the women crown employees office.

[11:15]

The honourable members will notice that the women crown employees office has made several changes in the format of the report as well. For instance, the ministry and agency chapters have been simplified and are provided under separate cover. The report is similar to those of preceding years in that it reports on corporate activities and analyses government-wide statistics. It shows some very positive trends are beginning to emerge in the status of women crown employees. For example, the number of women moving into job areas where they have been under-represented or into levels that they have never reached before, has increased from 130 in 1975-76 to 440 in 1976-77. In addition, 23 of the 29 ministries and agencies for which we have comparable data reported a slight narrowing of the wage gap between men's and women's salaries for the 1976-77 year.

During the year 1975-76, the average woman's wage was 70.4 per cent of the average male's wage; during 1976-77 that had risen to 72.3 per cent.

While we are pleased to see these improvements, we are aware there has been little change in the occupational distribution of female employees. A strong continued effort in the affirmative action program will be required to bring about this long-term goal.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Before the orders of the day, I wish to table the answers to questions 104, 105, 106 and 107 standing on the notice paper. (See appendix.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY

SECURITIES ACT

Hon. Mr. Crossman moved third reading of Bill 7, An Act to revise the Securities Act.

Mr. Breithaupt: There is one particular thing that I did want to bring to the attention of the minister as we complete this bill in a formal way.

As members of the House will recall, the committee stage of this bill was finished on Wednesday, June 21. Now that the bill has been reprinted, we are able to proceed with it in the normal way. However, on Monday and Tuesday, June 19 and 20, there were certain public hearings dealing with the matter which is known as "going private" which the Ontario Securities Commission held in the Macdonald Block.

Those meetings related to some comments which the minister made during the committee stage of the bill when he spoke in committee on June 15. At that time, he acknowledged the great complicated problem that this whole subject brought to the securities industry and he said the following:

"This is a difficult and complicated area where detailed policy requires the benefit of experience. Accordingly, it would not be feasible to include guidelines in the bill at this time. However, I have instructed Mr. Baille in the Ontario Securities Commission to prepare draft guidelines indicating the basis on which their discretion will be exercised, and explaining in more detail how they interpret the word 'control.'

"These guidelines will be published for comment and discussion and will be revised in final form before the bill is proclaimed into law. Should discussion of the draft guidelines, or subsequent experience, indicate that changes are needed in the legislation, we will not hesitate to return to the assembly with appropriate proposals for an amending bill."

This matter particularly refers to section 91 in the bill. Following the statement that the minister made. I am somewhat concerned as to whether it is his intention not to have this bill proclaimed until those regulations are in place. Or is it the minister's intention to have the bill proclaimed, and then deal with the matter for regulation? It would be my view that the security bill, Bill 7, and the following two bills should be in place at the earliest opportunity. But I am wondering if the minister can tell us what procedure he intends to follow with respect to proclamation, so that the industry can clearly know just what the ground rules are?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: There were a couple of matters raised at the committee stage. The one I recall the member referring to, and reading from the transcript, I think related not so much to the going private situation as to the takeover provisions of the legislation.

Mr. Breithaupt: More common.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: These, of course, were the more common situations up until the last recent number of months.

With regard to those provisions we did want specifically to indicate to the industry that we did have some reservations, after having heard from them both at the securities commission level and at committee stage. We were concerned that perhaps the takeover provisions were such that they may stop some takeovers that might otherwise occur and operate to the advantage of Ontario and Canada generally. So it was because of that concern that we wanted to be in a position to indicate to the industry the circumstances under which the commission would be exercising its rights and discretion to grant an exemption from those takeover provisions. That would provide some degree of predictability so that some takeovers, which might operate to the advantage of our economy in Ontario, could occur and proceed without speculation or worry.

It was that provision, not so much the going private part, that we were addressing at that time; although we have made clear, both in and outside the committee, our concern, as the members will be well aware, about the new phenomenon of going private. We have made it very clear that we are studying it and will have much more to say about it in the next few months.

Specifically we undertook the committee to try and develop those rules before the bill is proclaimed. My understanding is that we agreed at the committee stage to try and develop both those guidelines and the guidelines for disclosure of senior officers' salaries prior to proclaiming the legislation.

At the current time, Mr. Baillie has told me that he expects it would take almost the balance of this calendar year to have all that in place because they are very complicated regulations. He said if we were to stay on that course the bill would not be proclaimed until, say, the end of this year. That does give me some cause for concern. I must say to the member that as of this date—the bill only having passed committee last Wednesday, as you know—I haven't resolved a course of action with Mr. Baillie, either to go ahead without those rules in place, or to hold off until those rules are in place.

If the member and the House will permit us, we will let the critics know what our intentions are, and the industry know what our intentions are, literally in the next three or four weeks. But I must be honest: we haven't been able to resolve those two conflicting concerns at the present time.

Motion agreed to.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION AMENDMENT ACT

(concluded)

Resumption of the adjourned debate on the motion for second reading of Bill 126, An Act to amend the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Mr. Kerrio: Mr. Speaker, in the interests of getting the business of the House completed, I would like to summarize and get on the record just a couple of my concerns regarding the bill.

As I suggested before, the increases in the act certainly are welcome on all sides of the House. But along with the increases I must read into the record the concerns that I have as they relate to the payments. As the cost escalation that relates to pegging these payments concerns me, I would like to read into the record the increases in assessments from 1970. I am taking a particular group because this was reported in a report by one of the auto manufacturers—group 306. In 1970 the rate for group 306 was $59.90 per $100. By 1974, it had more than doubled to $132. For 1978, it had risen to $337.50. This represents a 470 per cent increase since 1970 and a 155 per cent increase since 1974.

The reason I make much of this aspect of Workmen's Compensation is because I have a very strong feeling that unless we take the responsible position of doing something about relieving some industry from the burden entirely, and that the burden be shared by those other people in our society, it becomes very easy to pass legislation that would just take increases and pass the cost to a third party. I think that area could very well be looked into and a reasonable assessment made so that those people who cannot just pass on those substantial increases are given some form of help.

In the minister's program as it relates to safety, where there was an involvement of employees, employers and the government—an extremely good program—the results are known to all in the industry. We have established something there that was beyond what most people had expected or hoped for. We've reduced the accidents because we had the co-operation of employers, employees and the government. I am suggesting that until such time as everyone related to workmen's compensation becomes involved in a more meaningful way we will continue to have these kind of increases before us. I am just a little afraid they will put us in a position where we become less and less competitive on the international scene.

So while I am very pleased about what has happened here, and I am particularly pleased about the retroactivity, I would ask the minister in some further studies to look into that matter as it relates to more involvement with everyone involved in Workmen's Compensation at any level to participate to the degree that it is to the advantage of everyone concerned, to have a better record, to have fewer injured workers, to look after and retrain those who are injured, and to make the whole system work to the benefit of everyone in this community and in society. [12:00]

Mr. Foulds: Mr. Speaker, I just have three points that I would like to make and I would like to make them as briefly as possible this morning. I would like to make them as a result of some of the things that were said, or not said, last night and during the course of the debate.

Mr. Nixon: Was there something not said last night?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Everything was said.

Mr. Foulds: All kinds of things were left unsaid last night.

Although I disagree profoundly with the attitudes expressed by the member for Niagara Falls and supported by the government, I must say that I respect the viewpoint. I disagree with it profoundly because I think it starts from a wrong premise; the member for Niagara Falls obviously has the same feeling about my viewpoint.

This morning I would like to discuss, if possible in a civilized way, a few of the reasons for those differences.

Mr. Kerrio I just proved that I could do it both ways.

Mr. Lupusella: Why don't you shut up?

Mr. Foulds: Yes, indeed, the member was very calm this morning.

I think it is important that we recognize the concept of workmen's compensation for what it is. The concept is that we compensate a worker who has been injured on the job in terms of his earnings at the time of the accident. In some sense there is a fundamental flaw in the way we have administered the program that is not addressed in this particular bill, except incidentally in section 2 and some of the subsections by agreeing to a percentage difference for each of the years.

What we don't take into account is the loss in earning power. Over roughly the last 35 years, we have had a period of inflation of various rates. Since the 1930s we have not had a period of deflation. It would seem to me that if, as a result of the actuarial soundness in the plan, we cannot take into account the projected increase that a worker who is injured loses in terms of the increase that would naturally accrue to him as he worked and perhaps went up the ladder in terms of position—in terms of apprenticeship to journeyman, or in the case of my dad, for example, from section man to section foreman to roadmaster; he was blocked from going to the roadmaster's position because of an injury that made him ineligible for the position. If we cannot take that into account—and I think we should—at least we should take into account an indexing that would keep his level of income in line with the increase in the cost of living. It seems to me that is only fair.

It may not be possible to do it in the emergency situation that we have had in the House yesterday and today; we want to get this bill through. However, I think it is a concept that the minister and the board should look at. It struck me with some irony that we passed a bill yesterday morning having to do with the Crown Timber Act which met the indexing requirements, justifiably, in terms of the levies paid by the pulp and paper companies for the product they get from the people of Ontario related to the cost of the end product and what they receive in the market.

If we can devise a formula of indexing that seems to give security and certainty to the industry in that case, at a moving level, surely we could devise an indexing formula in this case to give the worker who is injured the certainty and the security of knowing that at least his level of income would match the cost of living increase. I would submit to this House that if that happens we would, in fact, save a good deal of administrative costs, in terms of the board, because a number of the cases that I receive, and that every member of this House receives, that the board itself receives, are reassessments and re-evaluations of an old case, simply because the person can no longer survive on the amount of the benefits.

It may not be necessary to do a medical reassessment and so on. I think we would save some administrative costs that way and I think we would certainly save a lot of emotional and functional overlay that sometimes applies in these cases. I think that is one of the benefits that the board and the minister should look at in considering that avenue.

The other point is that which the member for Niagara Falls seemed to make, that as a human being, he would like to give as generous benefits as possible without destroying the economy. I may be doing his argument an injustice but, as I heard it, that seems to be if we don't make our industry uncompetitive.

I quote from the Wyatt report—and I admit that it's selective—on page 175, under the heading, "Who pays for Workmen's Compensation?" Essentially, the report says:

"In the end, the total cost of employing a worker includes wages and the cost of all employee benefits, including the cost of workmen's compensation. The employer must weigh this total cost against the value of the worker's output in determining whether to employ the worker. Thus, the cost of all alleged social gains can be considered to fall invariably upon the wage earner." You can take that argument to its logical conclusion and it sometimes falls on the wage earner in terms of unemployment. But it does fall on the wage earner and the working people of this province; and I think we should recognize they are the people who pay for the cost of compensation.

The final point that I want to make, Mr. Speaker, is that we fundamentally disagree with the position of both the Liberal and the Conservative parties in terms of how wealth gets created in this province. I want to put to you very, very succinctly that no matter how much money, no matter how much investment, no matter how much managerial skill the free-enterprise system puts into our economy, the gross provincial product would not exist, the gross national product would not exist, wealth would not exist if it were not for labour.

Labour is the essential ingredient in the creation of wealth. You take away that essential ingredient and we would have an economy like the middle ages or worse. It is the only essential ingredient in the creation of wealth. If that is so, it seems to us that we should treat those people whose activity, whose work creates that wealth, with dignity and we should treat the loss of their ability to work with dignity; and some of the workmen have, unfortunately, sacrificed their lives and their limbs simply in the pursuit of work. We should recognize that work is the essential element in the creation of wealth, we should recognize that even within a bill as confined as the Workmen's Compensation Board Act, and we should, therefore, pay the reward for work.

We should, therefore, pay the compensation benefits that are related to the wages earned at a level of dignity that allows that person to continue to live in dignity, to be a human being in dignity when he loses that ability to work and create wealth.

Mr. Sweeney: Mr. Speaker, I want to participate just for a very brief period of time. I must say I am moved by the remarks of the previous speaker. I would certainly support his contention that the efforts of labour, of the working people of the province, certainly are an essential component to the creation of wealth in all economic sectors of our province. I would only point out to the member, however, that they are one of the essential components. They are not the only component, and so at one and the same time I am strongly supporting his contention but just trying to put it somewhat into perspective.

Mr. Speaker, the only point I want to address myself to, and I guess it's more in the form of a question than in the form of a comment, is with respect to those injured workers who are on partial permanent disability pensions. I am not able to understand as clearly as I would like to the way in which this bill assists those kinds of workers. It was brought up last night by one of the members of the third party—and I am sorry I can't recall which member—that the particular salary range on which, as I understand it, permanent partial disability payments are made, are not always the fairest way of dealing with the situation.

If you take a worker who was injured in 1972, or 1973, or whatever year you choose to pick, and recognize that his disability pension is based upon his earnings at that particular point in time, and even though there are periodic percentage increases there still seems to be a considerable disproportion, and

I would suggest, Madam Minister, a dis-service to that worker in respect of what he potentially could be earning at this point in time, even assuming he stayed at that same job, even if we assume that there were no potential increases in his particular status, that he hadn't moved, let's say, into the position of a foreman or a supervisory officer at some point in time. The question I would like to address to the minister is, has this particular factor been given any serious consideration and to what extent, because I quite admit I can't understand directly how the bill relates to that particular factor.

The second point I would like to ask the minister about is to what extent this bill in any way relates to that same person on a permanent partial disability with respect to his inability to get another job. I am sure the minister is well aware of the number of such persons who come to our attention as members of this Legislature who in desperation say: "I have tried everything. I have tried to get light work. I have tried to get part-time work." Even though the message has supposedly gone out from the ministry that employers are under some obligation to provide some assistance to this person, I simply can't get it.

I know there is a provision at the present time that a person who is still in the process of looking for work will get a larger compensation benefit, but I also understand there is a limit to that, that at some point in time this appears to be cut off. I would like some explanation from the minister to what extent that factor is covered in this bill; and thirdly, speaking again to the same group of people, to what extent people who have been on permanent partial disability pensions for quite a long period of time before the particular practice that I just described came into force. I understand it is a fairly recent innovation with the compensation board; it has only been in the last short period of time. It is not my understanding that it does cover people who date back a couple of years.

[12:15]

Quite frankly, with respect to this bill I am dealing with a very narrow group of people, but it has been my experience as a member of this Legislature that it is that particular group of people with which I have had the greatest difficulty in providing some assistance. They simply seemed to be locked into a system and into a structure that has no way out. With all the goodwill in the world on everyone's part, the system doesn't seem to work for those people. They are perhaps in more desperate straits than almost anyone else. I would appreciate it if the minister could address herself to that.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It has been an interesting experience, to say the least, to hear the presentations of all the members in both parties on the opposite side of the House over the last several hours.

There have been some interesting suggestions and some queries about the scope of the bill which is before us. I would remind honourable members that the scope of this bill is necessarily limited. It is limited specifically to increasing benefit levels for those who receive benefits from the Workmen's Compensation Board on the basis of increased costs to those individuals and, in a way which, it is hoped, will cover most of those increased costs.

The policies, the philosophy, structure and function of the board are not addressed in Bill 126. It is obvious on even a brief perusal of the Wyatt report that as a result of the Wyatt study some of those structures and functions and perhaps some of the philosophies, and policies may need to be re-examined critically. It is my intention to pursue that line of activity throughout the summer months and thereafter with the hope of developing whatever is necessary in the way of providing those improvements.

This bill is limited specifically to the improvement of benefit levels. Although it does not address itself directly to the extra benefits which were available to the permanently partially disabled while they are in the process of looking for employment, those benefits will accrue to them because the extra funding which is available will be provided at the increased base for those individuals.

There is really no limitation to that benefit as long as the individual workman is co-operating in a vocational rehabilitation program and co-operating with his vocational rehabilitation officer. The case must be reviewed on a regular basis—six months, a year or something of that sort—but as long as there is evidence of co-operation those benefits can continue. In some instances, they have gone on for several years. That was brought in in 1975 with the amendments. I am given to understand that most of those with permanent partial disabilities who have not made themselves available for this kind of assistance have not benefited. But it is possible to make application to the board for that kind of service, if it is necessary.

The suggestions that have been made about the way in which the Wyatt report might be carried out have been very useful. I would like honourable members to know that over the summer months the special committee which is made up of staff of my ministry will have some representation on it from other ministries and certainly from the Workmen's Compensation Board. It will be examining the Wyatt report and assessing all of the alternative concepts which are inherent in that report.

I should be delighted to have any critical assessment or any kind of input which the honourable members opposite would like to submit to me during the summer months in the process of this initial, fairly in-depth examination of the report. When that has been completed, I am very willing to take under serious consideration the idea which was proposed by the member for Quinte (Mr. O'Neil) that a small group, representative of all parties, might take a look at the report in the light of the assessment which is carried out by the committee. I shall certainly consider that most seriously because that may be a very useful way in which to do this.

I do believe, as a result of the very exhaustive study which the Wyatt Company carried out, that there are some recommendations which must be considered seriously regarding the role, the structure and the function of the Workmen's Compensation Board. It is essential that we do that as carefully but as rapidly as we can.

There were some questions raised about the rationale for the ceiling and raised about moving to a universal insurance program for accident victims. There is a conflict here because, if we were to attempt to move to a universal accident insurance program, we would be limiting the possibility of introducing that program if we took off the income ceiling. We are not going to be able to develop an actuarial base upon which to establish a universal program unless we have some carefully defined parameters in order to move in that direction.

Suggestions have been made, and I am aware of the amendments which the New Democratic Party is bringing in, but I can only suggest that it was my concern to bring in reasonable and responsible increments in the benefit levels which were very closely related to the increase in cost of living. The final figure of six per cent was related to the best estimate that could be made at the time of the cost-of-living increase for this year; it may be a little out of line now, but it certainly was made on that basis just a few weeks ago when it was established.

I am informed that these recommendations also closely follow the recommendations of the joint consultative committee, which is a committee appointed for the board's edification and made up of representatives of trade unions and management, and of ordinary citizens within the community, I am informed that their recommendations to the board were very closely in line with the recommendations which appear before the members of the House.

Mr. O'Neil: Can we get a copy of those?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I don't have a copy of them, but I shall try to get a copy for the member. However, I am informed that they are very close to those as well; so that there has been external assessment of this need by a group not directly related to the benefits of the board but certainly with great interest in the board's function and that their recommendations closely approximate these.

I would remind the members that the amendments which the New Democratic Party is suggesting for this bill are really changes which are perhaps in conflict with some of the philosophy and some of the ideas of the social contract between employers and employees—a social contract which I would be very unhappy to see broken at this time. I would hope that they would think very seriously about those amendments at this time. They may be useful amendments to consider when we consider further modifications of the Workmen's Compensation Act in the total concept of the act, rather than simply on the basis of benefit levels.

Mr. Speaker, that is really all I would like to say at this time. I am grateful for the interesting suggestions that have been made regarding some of the new initiatives or the new directions which might be considered for workmen's compensation in this province and they will most certainly all be considered very seriously.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION AMENDMENT ACT

Consideration of Bill 126, An Act to amend the Workmen's Compensation Act.

On section 1:

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Chairman, just a few minutes ago I heard the Minister of Labour herself state that the scope of this particular bill is quite limited. The limited scope of the bill is also reflected in this particular section 1(1)(a). I remember when I made a speech on the budget on June 21, 1976, on the floor of this Legislature, and I drew the attention of the Minister of Labour to the fact that something was bothering me about this particular section. I want to quote for the record what I said in 1976.

Hon. B. Stephenson: What section?

Mr. Lupusella: Section 1(1)(a). For the sake of the record I want to report what I said in 1976 in the budget debate. I quote: "In a province where the average cost of burial is $1,200 the act only allows $600 for the burial of a worker killed on the job. I guess the difference is a sort of deterrent fee."

I was quite dissatisfied. People are complaining about this particular cost. It's a clear cut case that workers are dying and the Workmen's Compensation Board is not adequately reflecting the cost of a burial. I want to share with the minister my sense of frustration when I'm dealing with so many widows and widowers in my area who are saying the Workmen's Compensation Board is not paying sufficient money for the burial costs of workers who die on the job. They show this sense of frustration.

I'm sure the Minister of Labour and the Workmen's Compensation Board do not really understand the position of a lot of people in the province of Ontario, specifically, people coming from different ethnic backgrounds, who are really concerned about the burial costs. For them, it's some sort of veneration they want to show to the person who died on the job or who died a natural death. They want to express their veneration to the person who died either on the job or of natural causes by having a decent burial ceremony. That's what this government and the Minister of Labour do not understand.

What this government is doing in this particular clause is offending the tradition of a lot of people in the province of Ontario coming from different ethnic backgrounds who are really concerned about the cost of burial. I know the Minister of Labour disagrees with me but it's a reality which exists in the province of Ontario and I want to bring to the attention of the Minister of Labour this particular concern of a lot of people, particularly people from different ethnic communities, to have a decent burial ceremony. The minister is emphasizing the $800, but even though the amount was increased from $600 to $800 the average cost of a burial was around $1,200 in 1976 and I guess the cost has increased in 1978.

Why is she not taking into consideration this concern coming from different people? They're not just losing their husband or their wife, but they have to pay more for the burial cost because, as I stated before, they are particularly concerned and through the ceremony they want to express this sense of veneration to the person who passed away.

I expressed this concern in 1976. I don't think that the $800 payment is sufficient. Even though the Minister of Labour showed some concern in providing for a $200-increase, she is very well aware that the average cost is around $1,500 for a decent burial.

Mr. Ziembra: It is $2,000.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It is not.

Mr. Lupusella: It's not? Do you have a figure for that?

Mr. Ziembra: Can you bury somebody for $800?

Hon. B. Stephenson: I have had some recent experience with it.

Mr. Lupusella: Again, the Minister of Labour really doesn't want to understand the concern of those people who want to have a decent burial ceremony. She missed the main principle of what I have just said.

Mr. Ziembra: A cardboard box.

Mr. Lupusella: If you are really concerned about multiculturalism, since the government is talking about multiculturalism, that's how this government can interpret the needs of those people.

Mr. O'Neil: That's not a matter of principle in the bill.

Mr. Lupusella: Through tradition and custom they are getting into this situation. They are losing their husbands and they are losing their wives. They have to pay more money. The Workmen's Compensation Act does not properly cover the total cost. I don't know if the minister made any inquiries around the province of Ontario that would suggest that the average burial cost is $800. I don't have the same estimate. I would like to hear from her.

Mr. Ziembra: Name the funeral homes.

Mr. Lupusella: I hope that when she brings in legislation, she will take into consideration this concern.

Hon. B. Stephenson: The survey which was carried out by the Workmen's Compensation Board and by others regarding funeral costs would lead us to believe that $800 would cover the average cost for most funerals. It should be noted that it's not the purpose of Workmen's Compensation Board death benefits to line the pockets of funeral directors. The purpose is to meet the cost which is imposed upon a family as a result of that death. That is why there is an immediate lump sum payment of $800 proposed in the revised benefits, as well as the funeral cost of $800, an increase of $200 each of those benefits. There is as well the cost which will be covered at whatever it is for the necessary transportation of the body.

It would seem to me that because Ontario is now leading, except for British Columbia, in this area that probably we are at this level meeting the actual cost of funeral services in most instances.

Mr. McClellan: We're leading except for British Columbia? We are not leading the way?

Hon. B. Stephenson: There it is only $855, or $55 more.

Mr. Lupusella: You're missing the principle of what I was saying.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I know what you are saying.

Mr. Bounsall: Speaking very briefly to this same section, I must admit this doesn't occur to me to be a place where I would naturally place an amendment increasing the amount. I certainly appreciate the feelings of the member for Dovercourt and members coming from communities in which a certain level and standard of funeral and burial are the accepted norm. I am a member of the Memorial Society and a very strong supporter of all their activities. I have a prepaid funeral for myself which costs much less than the $800.

Mr. O'Neil: Stay with us a while.

Mr. Bounsall: I will be cremated in the cardboard box in which caskets are shipped, after they have removed—

Hon. B. Stephenson: You are not intending to use it this week, are you?

Mr. Bounsall: It's all ready. It's prepaid and that's the way I feel I can be disposed of with dignity when the time comes. Anything else is unduly ostentatious. It only costs $4 to open up the cemetery plot the size to get the ashes in—

Mr. Haggerty: He's just telling us $800 is too much.

Mr. Bounsall: That to me is the way things should be going, although I will probably arrange for the person who opened that up to be tipped handsomely.

Hon. B. Stephenson: You are not suggesting this should be reduced on the basis of your experience?

Mr. Bounsall: No, I'm not. I find myself very much in the minority in terms of my views on how my body should be disposed of. I do appreciate the feeling that is prevalent in large segments of our society that a somewhat different funeral, disposal and burial practice should be carried out and is the norm.

In this regard, I quite appreciate the minister's view too that what we shouldn't be doing is lining the pockets of the funeral directors. I would suspect from my contacts through the memorial society with funeral directors, that they would immediately be aware of the amounts in the Workmen's Compensation Board Act, and their first question would be to any widow or widower, were they killed in the work place. And somehow, automatically their cost would be, as a minimum, equal to what they have in the act. That, I agree with the minister, should not be encouraged.

In the thorough, ongoing review which we make of the act, as prompted by the three authors of the Wyatt report, maybe we could have a look at that area. However, I am not inclined personally to be too interested in this section. Perhaps we should be putting some sort of maximum on it and paying 75 per cent of whatever the funeral cost is up to this maximum. Then the widow or widower can feel some freedom to choose a range of funeral services, knowing beforehand she or he is paying a quarter or a third of that total that would not be reimbursed by the board. Perhaps that's one of the things we could consider.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Shall section 1(1) (a) stand as part of the bill? Carried.

Mr. Bounsall moves that in subsections 2 and 3 clauses (c), (d), (e) and (f) of subsection 1 of section 36 of the act be amended by, in clause (i): replacing $318 to $448, in clause (ii), replacing $344 with $493, in clause (iii), $365 with $523, (d) replacing $93 with $95, $99 with $101, $98 with $99, $106 with $109, and $113 with $116 where those numbers occur.

And following clause (f) shall be added: "and the amounts payable under this section shall be adjusted on the first day of July in each succeeding year commencing with July 1, 1979 by a percentage amount equal to the percentage change in average wages and salaries in Ontario for the calendar year previous as indicated by the industrial composite average weekly wages and salaries for Ontario published by Statistics Canada."

Mr. Bounsall: I am speaking briefly to this, but I hope with some conviction. There are three principles involved in this amendment: The minor one of the three is the fact that the percentages used to change the existing numbers in the bill, I found had no rationale to them. The first change is to be a change reflecting the cost of living or per cent salaries and wages for the year 1975. The minister has 11 per cent in the bill. The cost of living for 1975 went up 10 per cent, and the per cent increase in salaries and wages went up 12 per cent. As I said last night, perhaps she chose the middle ground, 11 per cent, between those two. That would be fine.

The same remarks would apply to the year 1976 for the second change. It could have been guessed at, as I was doing, that she was choosing the middle ground between the increase in the cost of living and increase in salaries and wages. This works out to eight per cent, the cost-of-living increase being six per cent, and the increase in salaries and wages 10 per cent.

If that were the case, however, when one gets to the third change embodied in the bill, which would be looking at the entire year 1977—and numbers are available for the entire year—the cost of living went up 14 per cent—actually that is a rounded off figure, it went up 13.9 per cent—and the per cent increase in salaries and wages was six per cent. Again if one is splitting the difference we would get a 10 per cent factor, rather than the one chosen by the minister—six per cent. So that rationale fell apart then in terms of what she may have been doing in choosing the mix. There is no justification for the six per cent.

The question was then, what does one pick? Does one agree with the minister in her 11 and eight per cent, and propose a 10 per cent which would be assuming a mix of those two—an equal mix of those two factors? Or should one take the consumer price index directly, in which case it would be lower in the first two years and much higher for the third adjustment? Or should one take per cent salaries and wages?

As I stated last night, all I did was choose one of those three alternatives; rather than the cost of living, rather than the 50-50 mix of cost of living and per cent increase in salaries and wages, I choose the per cent increase in salaries and wages, on the basis that this is the rational adjustment to be made to benefits which are supported to make some compensation for the loss of earnings of workers in the work place. That is the most rational basis on which to place it—salaries and wages. So I simply have adjusted in the bill, and this is the first time it reflects it, for each of the figures in the bill, a 12 per cent rather than 11 per cent in the first year, a 10 per cent rather than an eight per cent in the second year of the adjustment, and I agree that six per cent would be the comparable figure in the third. So those changes are reflected in the numbers, and this occurs throughout the bill.

They are small changes, but it is an attempt, by moving these amendments, to have the board and the ministry accept that there should be some rationale for the numbers which one picks to make those change in benefits. This is preferable to the ad hoc system which, surprisingly in so comprehensive a report that took 15 months in the making, was defended by Mr. Field, Mr. Inglis and Mr. Smart from the Wyatt Company who wrote the report. One almost gets the distinct feeling that they are promoting an ad hoc system with respect to changes, something which I would hope the ministry and the board would have by now moved away from.

However those are small changes. I would not be unduly upset if the ministry decided that the changes were sufficiently small between the figures proposed by the ministry and by myself, they weren't worth making the change. Although in each and every case, because of the higher starting figures for the first two years, they do result in slightly higher figures coming out.

[12.45]

The second principle, and this is the important one, I feel in this section, is the pension being paid to the widows and widowers of workers killed in the work place. Those figures used in the bill as the base were those figures introduced in 1975 and moved away from the position which the board had taken in the years 1971 to 1975. Then the amount paid to widows and widowers, because of their spouses being killed in the work place, was identical to the minimum of the totally permanently disabled.

That was in existence from 1971 to 1975 in the board. It looked as if, and it was never denied, that was the rationale why those figures were identical. It was never positively stated by the board that this is why those figures are there, but when pointed out that they were identical heads would nod wisely as if that was the basis and a rational basis for why those were identical.

In 1975, we increased rather substantially the minimums for the totally permanently disabled and increased the widows' and widowers' pensions only by the 10 per cent adjustment that we made in 1975. Therefore, we were moving off what I think was a very valid principle: that the pension paid to a widow or widower as a result of their spouse being killed in the work place the pension should—not only could but should be identical with the pension that would be paid to that spouse if that spouse had survived but was now permanently disabled.

It seems to me those have full justification for being identical, because what could be more permanently disabling to a worker than to be killed in the work place? Therefore those pensions should be identical. So you will see in the bill the actual change for the widows and widowers is substantial. I have moved them from the numbers in the bill to be equal to the permanently fully disabled category with those small percentage changes which I have mentioned previously.

The final clause is the automatic escalator. Again, this is something not favoured by the three authors of the Wyatt report. But again I was struck by the very retrogressive attitude of the authors of the Wyatt report with respect to why they shouldn't index. Their contention was that if one indexed, this might be inflationary. Therefore, if it was going to be inflationary we shouldn't index. And of course all this does is keep workers—

Mr. Haggerty: Sheer nonsense.

Mr. Bounsall: This is the Wyatt report. I don't know whether you have read it yet, Ray. That certainly is a nonsensical statement in Wyatt when you are adjusting well behind the fact. We've called for an adjustment to be made in July according to the changes made in the previous calendar year. So they are still well behind.

The justification given by these three gentlemen for that section of the Wyatt report dealing with the adjustment of benefits certainly makes their whole attitude suspect in my mind. The authors of the Wyatt report, I think, appear quite capable in terms of looking at the financial arrangements and rating experience practices and the financial position of the board and how the board should operate differently in administrative terms and the cost associated with that administration. I think they are quite capable as actuaries in dealing with those aspects. But with those statements occurring early on in section 3—that we shouldn't index benefit provisions because it might be inflationary—makes that whole section suspect.

They certainly can look at balance sheets and certainly from their practice as actuaries make thorough estimates of the other parts of the report, but it reflects that their social conscience, with respect to that kind of benefits, is quite suspect just from that particular comment alone, and their willingness throughout to be the kings of ad hockery and to have no rational basis for the percentages they propose.

We very much feel in the final section in this amendment that it should be adjusted yearly by the same percentage equal to the percentage change in the average wages and salaries across Ontario, it would give the board ample time to do it. For example, the percentage change in average salaries and wages for 1978 would be known no later than February or March 1979, giving ample time to change the figures for July 1 in terms of paying out those benefits. That would help the board administratively. It would cause them no administrative problems with that much lead time.

I would like to make one final comment on the numbers affected. Since the debate last night, I got the absolutely up-to-date figures on how many widows and widowers we're talking about in Ontario. There are 62,263 persons on pensions in Ontario of whom only 5,045 are widows and widowers as of April 6, 1978. We're not talking about a very large percentage of the pension recipients of the board. Roughly around eight per cent or a shade less would be affected by this amendment. We're talking about roughly a $150 per month change or about $750,000 in the total per month to pay them a pension that's properly in line with those who are permanently fully disabled.

I would hope the members of the Liberal Party would agree and the Minister of Labour would accept that this is now the valid basis on which widows' pensions should be based.

Mr. O'Neil: We will not be supporting this amendment. As I mentioned in my opening remarks concerning the bill, we would like more time to have a look at the Wyatt report and the other information that will be available to the members of this Legislature.

Mr. Deans: That's the government position.

Mr. O'Neil: At that time, we will be looking to see if amendments should be proposed. Therefore, we will not be supporting that amendment.

Mr. McClellan: I have to say I'm bitterly disappointed that the Liberal Party does not intend to support this amendment. As things stand now, the widow of a worker who is killed on the job is forced to rely on welfare, on social assistance, to support herself and her family.

Hon. B. Stephenson: She may be.

Mr. Deans: And most are.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. McClellan: I would like the minister to explain to me how a widow is supposed to raise a family on the payment that stands as of today, namely $265.

Hon. B. Stephenson: A widow with children gets benefits for the children as well.

Mr. McClellan: The reality is that the replacement income under the workmen's compensation program for the loss of a principal breadwinner through death has never been sufficient to enable the family to continue to live at any kind of a standard on compensation benefits alone. It is absolutely essential, if employment is not a possibility for whatever circumstances, for the widow to turn to social assistance. The minister knows that full well.

We have not raised the widows' benefits to an unreasonable amount. We have not, for example, as we could have done, raised the amounts in accordance with the standard of adequacy. We could have taken the position that widows' benefits ought to be based on a recognized standard of adequacy and set them accordingly. Because we feel it is the most reasonable thing to do at this time, we have chosen to base widows' pensions on the principle, as my colleague has stated, that the benefit paid to a widow ought to be the same as the maximum benefit paid to the spouse, had he lived, at full permanent total disability rate. That's precisely what we've done.

I believe, having done some calculations, that the amounts of money that would be granted under the amendment are certainly more generous than anything a family would receive through supplementation on general welfare assistance or family benefits. The amounts do approach a standard of adequacy; they are certainly above the Statistics Canada poverty line figures.

The principle ought to be—and I am deeply dismayed at the position of the Liberal Party—that the widow of an injured worker should not have to turn to welfare but that the workmen's compensation provisions ought to be adequate to enable her to support herself and her family.

The second point that I want to make is with respect to indexing. I have already commented on the sorry disgrace that it has been to all of us. It has been a blot on all of us that the compensation rates have not been raised since 1975. Any government that would allow the compensation rates to go unadjusted for three years should not be trusted. It's as simple as that. They should not be left with the discretionary power of when cost-of-living increases should be brought back before this House. We should amend the bill so that the cost-of-living increase is automatic. This government has betrayed that trust.

Mr. O'Neil: We may amend it, too, in the fall.

Mr. Ziemba: Then why don't you do it?

Mr. McClellan: Do it now while the bill is before you.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. McClellan: They can do it now, Mr. Chairman, while the bill is before them.

Mr. O'Neil: A little more study is needed to be—

Mr. Ziemba: You've studied it for three years.

Mr. McClellan: You don't need any more study.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order. Can I ask the member for Quinte to cease interjecting and the member for Bellwoods to address the chair?

Mr. McClellan: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I will ignore the interjections.

The index we have chosen as the automatic cost-of-living adjustment is the industrial composite average weekly wage. That is, without doubt, the most appropriate index for workers' compensation.

Mr. Ziemba: It's not too radical for the Liberals, is it?

Mr. McClellan: I say again, it is irresponsible to leave the discretion to bring back cost-of-living indexes to this government. Indexing has to be built into the bill, because this government has shown that it is not capable of being trusted to bring back the legislation for annual cost-of-living increases.

Mr. Haggerty: Mr. Chairman, I want to address myself to the particular section of the bill, section 1(2), I believe it is, and perhaps make a few comments on the amendments put forward by the member to my left.

Actually, the amendment is indexing the workmen's compensation to the present cost of living, wages and so forth, as mentioned by the members. I was interested to read page 188 of the Wyatt report dealing with indexing and escalation. I suppose one could get into this thing in some detail, but I just want to quote from one paragraph.

"Attempts to compensate for inflation are not, of course, a cure for inflation. The only cure for inflation is to end inflation." It goes on to say: "We will not attempt to offer a solution." So perhaps it's going to be wide open for debate. Some of their other comments relate to the benefit area of the workmen's compensation as to whether to increase it and, in some cases, they even suggested decreasing it.

Hopefully, they are not going to take that approach or the government isn't going to accept the recommendations that the way to end inflation is to stop any increases at all to the injured workers. When I look at the amendment to the act, I note we have increased it for a surviving spouse to $365 per month. I would suggest to the minister, as the member for Bellwoods has mentioned, it is enough to drive a person to welfare or to go under the Family Benefits Act.

In fact, if you look at the Family Benefits Act closely enough, it far outweighs the benefits under the Workmen's Compensation Act. Under the Family Benefits Act, they will provide financial assistance to purchase a home and even to pay the rent. Under this act, if a surviving spouse through the loss of the breadwinner is left with a heavy payment on a mortgaged home, then $365 would perhaps only pay the mortgage on that home. There's nothing left for the survivor to maintain a self-sustaining good standard of living.

I feel in this particular area consideration should be given. I am sure in certain areas where there is a surviving spouse under certain circumstances maybe the home is paid for. In other cases, I think that with 25- to 30-year mortgages today, there are very few surviving spouses who will have removed that debt.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Would the honourable member permit me to make some adjustment in time for a minute?

On motion by Hon. Mr. Welch, the committee of the whole House reported progress.

Hon. Mr. Welch moved that the House sit past 1 o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON NOTICE PAPER

Hon. Mr. Welch: While we are still in House, could I just take a minute to table the answers to questions 29 and 128 standing on the notice paper, table the response to sessional paper 108 and table the answers to questions 33, 44, 109 and 110 standing on the notice paper. (See appendix.)

House in committee of the whole.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT (continued)

Resumption of consideration of Bill 126, An Act to amend the Workmen's Compensation Act.

On section 1:

Mr. Haggerty: I was addressing myself to the section of the bill that relates to spouses' benefits. The matter relates to the person who is left with a large debt such as a mortgage. There is no consideration given here that the board will take this into consideration. I think in a number of circumstances that consideration must be given to this particular area.

I don't know why the report says it wants to encourage the person, the surviving spouse, to remarry or enter into another similar contract. I can't quite accept that approach. I suggest to the minister in this particular area that there are persons who have lost their husband and who have a large debt that has to be paid off. Perhaps some widows do not wish to marry at the present time or in three or four or five years.

Consideration must be given in this particular area under certain circumstances. I leave it to the discretion of the board or to the minister to put something in the act that would allow for additional payments in case of a heavy debt where the breadwinners no longer can provide for the survivors and the family.

Mr. Lupusella: On that section, I hope the Liberal Party, particularly the member for Niagara Falls, will express their concern on that vote.

Mr. O'Neil: He's not here to defend himself.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Lupusella: Let me say, then, the Liberal Party as a whole.

Mrs. Campbell: Let's deal with the bill.

Mr. Lupusella: I'm speaking to the principle of the bill. I hope the Liberal Party as a whole will express their goodwill in relation to this amendment which has been introduced by my colleague to index injured workers' pensions to the cost of living.

As I stated last night, it seems that the total 25 per cent increase which is contained in Bill 126 does not really reflect the needs of injured workers. I especially emphasize one aspect or one angle about certain injured workers who are permanently partially disabled, namely, that the 25 per cent increase might result in an increase of $2, $3 or $4. What the minister is doing and what this government is doing is to upset those permanently partially injured workers with little pensions. In view of this increase, they will see only an additional $2 or $3 on their pay cheque at the end of the month coming from the Workmen's Compensation Board.

If I may, I think this amendment was supposed to be the main focus of solving the cause of injured workers in Ontario. That's why I am inviting the Liberal Party strongly, vehemently and adamantly, to support this amendment if they want to share their concern about injured workers without emphasizing really the problems employers will face on the increase in their premiums.

Nobody in Ontario would like to see accidents. That is the aim to which this Legislature should address itself in order to prevent this social disaster which takes place from one year to the next here in Ontario. I think the main problem, if this amendment is not passed by this Legislature, is again we will be penalizing a particular group of injured workers.

Mr. Chairman: Order. I would ask the member to return to the principle of the amendment, which is in regard to widows' and dependants' benefits. Does the honourable member have anything in regard to the amendment?

Mr. Lupusella: Yes, Mr. Chairman. As I stated before, I am particularly upset that the 25 per cent increase in that bill does not reflect the 30 per cent cost-price index. The Minister of Labour promised us in the past that she would take a close look at this situation. They are going to study the formula, but I don't really have too much trust in that commitment. Whenever we raise an issue in this Legislature, it takes years and years of study. Then the Minister of Labour comes out with a formula which is not even solving the problem. That's the comment which I wanted to raise.

Mr. Bounsall: One short comment, Mr. Chairman. I was quite pleased to hear the remarks of the member for Erie (Mr. Haggerty) on this amendment that deals with the adjustments of widow's pensions. Obviously, with his vast experience and time in the House with workmen's compensation, he feels that more of an adjustment should be made than has been provided in the bill. And I would hope that his colleagues in the Liberal Party would take that very much under advisement.

What I do object to—and I am not trying to be controversial here but I just feel that at some point it should be said and I agree very much with the remarks made by the member for St. George (Mrs. Campbell) last night—is that every year we are here in the last day or two of June dealing with a Workmen's Compensation Board benefit amendment, and at some point that should end. At some point we are going to have, and should have, sufficient time for a bill of this sort to be sent to committee outside the House where we can have a thorough and ongoing investigation of why the particular numbers were chosen and what ad hockery went into the choice of those numbers. Because it does disturb me that it should be so ad hoc a proposal as submitted by the three authors of the Wyatt report. And I feel rather strongly about this.

Certainly when we come to the consideration of the Workmen's Compensation Board report which should be taking place this fall, we can simply—

Mr. Chairman: That is not before the committee at this moment.

Mr. Laughren: We can debate it later on this afternoon.

Mr. Bounsall: That's right. I am speaking to that portion of the amendment which deals with the adjustment, the amount by which the pension should be adjusted. At that time, when we come to the consideration of the board's report in the fall, we can go into that ad hockery versus a formula situation, in some depth and over some days with the authors of these reports, the people who sat on those committees and so on. I understand that can be done at that point. But we should end the practice of dealing with it in the last day or two.

However, let me simply point out that the attitude of the member for Quinte rather disturbs me. We have had this bill since Monday. It is now Friday. No one member is busier than any other member. I have had time and my colleagues in this party have had time to thoroughly read the Wyatt report.

Mr. Laughren: Page after page.

Mr. Bounsall: I have read it twice. I have read the legislation. I have been able to make the adjustments on it, and it didn't take that much time. That is no reason for the member for Quinte, primarily charged with the bringing of the bill through for the Liberal Party, I gather, to sort of indicate that we will have a discussion in the fall, and implying that he hasn't had enough time in four days to have a comprehensive look at this bill. That does disturb me.

Mr. Laughren: Good point.

Mr. Bounsall: I am disturbed that we don't have more time. But at least we have had four days. That amount of work could have been done, as myself and other colleagues in our party have done; and I am affronted.

Mr. Lupusella: Most of it.

Mr. Bounsall: Most of us, right. And I am affronted that that is the excuse given by the spokesperson for the Liberal Party as to why they are not taking an in-depth look and supporting rational amendments placed by ourselves.

Mr. Laughren: Did the minister find a seat for Michael Starr yet?

Mr. Lupusella: Just smile, don't be upset.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I am not upset; I am just bored.

Mr. Lupusella: You never smile.

Mrs. Campbell: Mr. Chairman, I too wish to address myself to the provisions of these amendments as they affect a widow or widower. Unfortunately, I suppose that a greater number would be widows. That seems to be the experience that I have had in working with these cases.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Males are the weaker vessels, Margaret.

Mrs. Campbell: Yes, I understand that but in my experience of the injured work person—and I am not only dealing as some of my colleagues apparently are with injured workmen; I am thinking of those who are injured. The female worker gets basically very much less consideration under workmen's compensation than her male counterpart.

[1:15]

Mr. Laughren: John MacBeth understands that. John MacBeth knows that. As Minister of Labour he tried to do something about it. Bring back John MacBeth.

Mrs. Campbell: In this particular section, however, I would like to address myself to that portion which does deal with widows, because I had hoped that this minister, through all the staff she has to give consideration to the problems of women left as widows in our society, could have come up with something a little more equitable for these people.

One of the great crying needs in this community today is to take a look at pension benefits for widows, generally speaking. Usually this government, for example, in its provisions for pensions for its own staff is quite prepared to let the widow of such a staff person try to get along on infinitely less, as a result of pension, than the male employee has.

I would have thought, I would have hoped, that this minister with all of her staff might really have come forward with a very strong statement on behalf of those who are forced to live in these circumstances in our society today. That consideration has to come; it must come because the inequities are so very clear.

Yet here we are with a formula which does improve a situation but which doesn't really take into consideration the responsibilities of that dependant who is left widower.

Again, I am in the position where I feel almost as though I am taking bribe for the first time in my political career, because I feel I'm being bribed by these measures to proceed with consideration quite apart from all the other important considerations that should be before us. Because I have to; I have to see that this goes through. I must. We cannot delay the solution for these people any longer.

The treatment which has been accorded them has been inhuman, it has been inhuman, but I am powerless—

Mr. Laughren: I am glad you are supporting our amendments.

Mrs. Campbell: —to change this section, basically, I suppose, because of the rules of the House and the matter of money. I can't tell you how I could amend to give equity here. I don't know how I could amend to do that.

Mr. Laughren: There's no problem. It's not a money bill.

Mr. Bounsall: Support ours for the interim.

Mrs. Campbell: The indexing suggestion is one which this government has endorsed in the past for others. I would like to see this government with the same policies for its people as it has for the federal obligations. I would like to see that. Perhaps it might see the same principle for municipalities, but not here, not here. I don't understand it.

The minister is an honourable person and I accept that what she is trying to do is the best that she can, having in mind the matter of the whole cabinet and the cabinet discussions of this matter. But I do want to make a special appeal to her in this particular case, because her voice is strong. We know that, we realize that, and that gives her a very much greater responsibility, it seems to me.

The women in this House really do have to work sometimes to educate. This is a beautiful moment for her, to take that opportunity to educate the members of her cabinet who may not understand. In any event, I trust I have, made my point. I don't like this kind of a debate because often it gives the appearance of mouthing things for partisan political purposes. I have tried to avoid that. I have tried to avoid that because the overall concern that I have is for these people. I think I've proven that in my life in politics.

I would like, therefore, to challenge the minister to take a firm stand on the matter. I would like to engage her for a moment in time in this particular section in some philosophical debates on the matter, if she would engage in it, so that I could have assurance that by the fall we would come to grips with this problem and that we would, indeed, be reviewing it with a view to giving to widows, and automatically widowers too, but to widows primarily, some equity.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Could I just remind the honourable members that while I share their concern about those individuals who are left spouseless as a result of industrial accidents, I would remind them that the philosophy of the Workmen's Compensation Act has been that pensions are paid to disabled workers on the basis of earnings and, indeed, they're a function of the earnings of the individual, but under the act this allowance, if you like, or pension to the bereft spouse is, in fact, statutory in terms of its benefits.

My concern is that at this time we haven't time to debate all of the things that need to be examined in the area of perhaps modifying the philosophy of the act, which I think is something which would be a useful exercise for all of us and could be very productive in terms of modifying the act. I really would like to ensure that we get some reasonable increase in benefits on the road right now, but certainly that would have to be a part of the deliberations regarding the act in the future.

At the present time, under the present philosophy of the act, it seems to me that this is the right route to go. I'm not an economist. I have no mathematical expertise and I'm certainly not an actuary. I have been alarmed by the numbers of thoughtful people who are specialists in that kind of area, whose opinions I value and who have expressed real concern about the problems of indexing. I am aware of past enthusiasm for this kind of procedure and present caution regarding indexing. I think we must be as knowledgeable about that as we possibly can be. I believe we must develop a mechanism whereby annual changes to benefit levels can occur, but at this point I don't know what that mechanism is.

The Wyatt report gives us a little guidance towards several kinds of alternatives which might, indeed, be looked at in this area. This is why I am hoping that as a result of our in-depth study of it we will be able to develop a mechanism which will be more satisfactory. At the present time, we are working within the somewhat firm guidelines of the philosophy of the Workmen's Compensation Act. I think we should move with the recommendations which have been brought in.

Mr. Laughren: I understand what the minister said, and perhaps it is an indication of how desperately we need to change that approach to dependants' allowances, because it should not be viewed that way.

Hon. B. Stephenson: But that is the way it is.

Mr. Laughren: That's what I said, I understand that that's the way it is in a statutory manner, but that's not the way it should be. I really would hope that we have wide-ranging debate next fall. Perhaps we could set aside a day to debate the—

Hon. B. Stephenson: Cut 10 hours off the estimates and we will have the debate.

Mr. Laughren: No, we could add 10 hours on to the estimates to talk about the Wyatt report and the implications of the content.

Hon. B. Stephenson: You want to spend all fall on my estimates?

Mr. Bounsell: Why not?

Mr. Laughren: I must admit that there is a degree of pain involved in that kind of decision but we would be willing to make the sacrifice, yes.

Mr. Bounsell: I might just point out that it's a statutory requirement under the Workmen's Compensation Board Act that the WCB report that was tabled today be referred to a standing committee. There is no time limit on that. When that does occur this fall, that will be the time, whatever number of days it takes, to talk to the authors of the Wyatt report and any other expert staff you want to bring in to simply thrash that whole question out. We would be delighted to take the two or three days on this whole section at that time.

Mr. Chairman: All those in favour of Mr. Bounsell's amendment please say "aye."

All those opposed please say "nay."

In my opinion the nays have it.

Amendment stacked.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3:

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Bounsell moves that subsection 1 of the bill, subsection 8(c) of section 42 of the act, be amended by: in clause (a) replacing "11 per cent" by "12 per cent"; in clause (b), replacing "eight per cent" with "10 per cent;" adding after clause (c) "and the amounts payable under this section shall be adjusted on the first day of July in each succeeding year commencing with July 1, 1979, by a percentage amount equal to the percentage change in average wages and salaries in Ontario for the calendar year previous, as indicated by the industrial composite average weekly wages and salaries for Ontario published by Statistics Canada.

Mr. Bounsall: Just very briefly, in the previous amendment we have covered the change or attitudes in the House with respect to, at this point at least, the percentage changes that should automatically accrue. So I will not run over that part of the argument.

[1:30]

What this amendment highlights is, again, something which the minister has still not quite replied to. I thought I understood how she arrived at her 11 per cent for the year 1975, as a mix of the CPI and the per cent salaries and wages; how the eight per cent was arrived at for the year 1976, again as an equal mix of CPI and per cent salaries and wages; and yet for the third year, 1977, she chose the smaller of those two indices, the six per cent increase in salaries and wages, rather than the CPI, which was 14 per cent, or a mix of those two, which would have brought it up to 10 per cent.

I have explained the amendment which we have placed; that is, the pure and simple per cent salaries and wages increase, which turned out to be 12, 10 and a number, six, equal to what took place in the third year.

I would still ask the minister, is it purely ad hocery involved in the percentages picked, and is there no basis for it? And does she not agree with us that some basis could be chosen—and there are three areas you can choose to do it in: pure CPI, pure per cent increase in salaries and wages, or a 50-50 mix of the two—does she not agree that one of those three methods should have been chosen and, if so, why doesn't she do it as such in this bill?

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Chairman, I was in the process of proceeding with my comments previously, but it seems I was not addressing myself to the right amendment.

I want to take the opportunity here to emphasize a particular problem which is faced by a lot of injured workers in Ontario in relation to the level of disability as assessed by the Workmen's Compensation Board. I think there is a big loophole in the process of assessment, particularly as it affects injured workers who are permanently and partially disabled.

Injured workers are penalized in both ways. They are penalized because the level of benefits is not indexed to the cost of living and in the way in which the Workmen's Compensation Board is assessing the level of disability.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That's not in the bill.

Mr. Lupusella: It is part of the bill. I am trying to emphasize that they are penalized in both ways; and if the minister does not accept the particular amendment that has been put forward by my colleague, we will penalize them further, because they are already penalized by the fact that the permanent disability rating schedule is too old. I think the Workmen's Compensation Board, in co-operation with the Minister of Labour, should revise the board's basis for assessing permanent and the partial disabilities.

I have in front of me the rating schedule, which upsets me. I want to give you an example, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: I would say to the honourable member he was referring a few minutes ago to revising the system. I don't think this amendment revised the system; it changes the rate.

Mr. Laughren: You have to agree it needs to be done, though, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. B. Stephenson: But it has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. Chairman: Would the honourable member return to the amendment, please?

Mr. Lupusella: Mr. Chairman, what I am trying to emphasize is that the amendment which has been introduced by my colleague would solve at least part of the problem faced by injured workers, because at least they wouldn't have to come around every year to put pressure on the government and the Workmen's Compensation Board in order that those changes take place.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It is not going to make any difference to the permanent or partially disabled.

Mr. Lupusella: The Minister of Labour is just trying to make promises, as she has done in the past, but the act should be revised, and the Workmen's Compensation Board and the Minister of Labour should take a look at the studies and reports that were tabled in the Legislature in order that suitable ways can be found to implement the right formula, which will take into consideration the cost-of-living increase.

We cannot count on those promises. Words are words. What this Legislature and the members of this party are looking for is a strong commitment to take a close look at the problems faced by injured workers, because the cost of living is increasing every year. There is no particular section in the bill which takes into consideration this particular concern. That is why it is imperative that the government and the Liberal Party support this clause to alleviate in some way problems encountered by injured workers in Ontario.

As I emphasized previously, the workers most affected are those who were injured a few years ago when the annual ceiling was not very high. As I stated before, we don't have very many injured workers in Ontario making $15,000 per year; now the ceiling has been increased to $16,200 a year. We don't have many workers in that position. Actually, the workers in this particular category who get an assessment from the Workmen's Compensation Board as a result of an accident are going to get a higher assessment as a result of the new ceiling, in comparison to those workers who were injured 10 or 15 years ago. That's where the Minister of Labour really fails to face this situation and cover this particular loophole which affects all of those workers who were injured in the past and who have a minimum level of pension because the ceiling in effect at the time they were injured was not very high. I don't think the present system takes their needs into consideration.

What I want to suggest to the Minister of Labour is that she take a close look at this permanent disability rating schedule so that it will be revised in order that the percentage be increased, because otherwise we are leaving an opportunity for the Workmen's Compensation Board to play its own game just on the percentage of this rating schedule. The figures might sound fine, but the Workmen's Compensation Board might assess the minimum level of disability and, when injured workers are faced with a permanent partial disability, they won't get the benefits they are looking for.

My final comment is to solicit the attention of the Minister of Labour to take a close look at the permanent disability rating schedule.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Chairman, may I just make one small comment? The potential cost to the employers of this province—this has been done by an expert, not by me—of the addition after clause (c) contained in this amendment is estimated to be in the order of $850 million.

Mr. Kerrio: Money doesn't mean anything to the NDP.

Mr. Chairman: All those in favour of Mr. Bounsall's amendment will please say "aye." All those opposed will please say "nay." In my opinion the nays have it.

Amendment stacked.

Mr. Bounsall: I have a further amendment on section 3(2). I believe you have a copy of this before you as well, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Bounsall moved that in section 3(2) of the bill, subsection 9 of section 42 of the act be amended by adding after "part" in line two, "except for a series of lump sum awards which taken together exceeds 10 per cent of the earning capacity of the employee."

Mr. Bounsall: This is a section which does bother me as to whether or not one should dispense with subsection 9 in total or make the kind of amendment which I have made. I do feel rather concerned that since lump sum payments have been made in the past, for whatever reason, that any amendments to the act increasing the amounts of pension paid should be paid on those lump sums.

I realize the administrative difficulty of that and in many cases, the small amounts of money involved in the initial instance anyway, for which the adjustment would then be small. I realize the effect upon the receiver is not very profound in any event. That is what has caused me to present this amendment which is, in essence, a compromise or a fallback position from that feeling which I have because of the small amounts of money thereby involved.

It covers the situation of a person who has initially been rated for a pension that was rated initially at eight per cent. I have one in my riding in precisely this situation now. Because it was less than 10 per cent, the act virtually requires that they be paid a lump sum. An appeal subsequently was made upon the pension rating and on appeal that was increased to 15 per cent. That represented another seven per cent. Because that was less than 10 per cent, again a lump sum award was made. Subsequent to that, some few years later, an appeal was made on that pension rating and it was again increased. I think it finally ended up that the pension rating which should have been that way all along, rather than eight per cent in the initial instance or 15 per cent at one point, should have been 22 per cent. Because of the difference between 15 per cent and 22 per cent is less than 10 per cent, a lump sum award comes out to her.

In no way, could she get anything else in each of those instances but that lump sum award which, if she had been given the pension rating she should have got in the first instance, which would have been 22 per cent, it would have come on a monthly basis and she would have been eligible and would have been receiving all of those increases to those pensions that is occurring in section 3 of this bill and occurred in 1974 and in 1975.

I'm quite willing to have the board not pay an increase in the pension to someone who has had a lump sum that is less than 10 per cent or even on the commuted amount where a pension has been commuted. It is for those persons caught in the situation of a series of lump sum awards which taken together are more than 10 per cent, more than the percentage by which they were required to take a lump sum, so that they have those additional percentages as outlined in this act applied to those lump sum awards.

They are caught by accident in an unfortunate situation of not having had proper pension ratings as they went along and being caught in a situation where lump sum awards by the act had to be paid out. Arriving at a final rating in this case I believe it's a final position—in her situation, which is well above, if it was given all at one time, the necessity to pay it in a lump sum, she has been and is continuing to be, unless this carries, in a situation where she is being disadvantaged because of inaccurate or not complete enough pension ratings, certainly in the first instance, and in the second instance of the three times that she's been in contact with the board over a pension rating.

I suppose that the wording could be changed slightly if this bothers the ministry or the Workmen's Compensation Board. I think the earning capacity phrase which I used in the amendment could more properly be clearer if I put in average earnings instead of earning capacity, so the amendment perhaps might best read, "except for a series of lump sum awards which taken together exceeds 10 per cent of the average earnings of the employee," just to be completely clear that I am talking about the pension rating on whatever the pension rating is based.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Do I understand that you want to change your amendment from what is before me?

Mr. Bounsall: If it would help. "Earning capacity" could easily be changed to "average earnings" if that poses any particular problem to the acceptance of the amendment. If you can do that easily that would be a help.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps unfortunate that we saw this amendment only late yesterday afternoon. The example which the member has given us is an intriguing example. I am not sure whether, indeed, it has any counterparts within the experience of the board, but it would seem to me that it's not likely to be very frequent.

I think this is something that perhaps could be considered at some point, but I really can't see at this stage of the game that it would be reasonable to consider this amendment with its complexity, not knowing what the incidence is likely to be, what the frequency is likely to be or what the cost is likely to be and I think it would be unwise to accept it.

Mr. B. Newman: May I suggest to the minister that she give careful consideration to the amendment, not necessarily accepting it today, and then amending the act at some time in the future if she finds the incidence quite frequent?

Mr. Bounsall: In response to the minister, I am encouraged by her attitude in this and may I just say, perhaps very sotto voce and it certainly shouldn't be advertised that they are so doing, that maybe the administration at the Workmen's Compensation Board, when this sort of case is brought to their attention, even though the legislation doesn't particularly—doesn't allow for it—in fact, would disallow it—that perhaps a slipup could be made at the board, and those adjustments made in any event?

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Mr. Bounsall has moved in section 3, subsection 2 of the bill that subsection 9 of section 42 of the act be amended by adding after "part" in line two, "except for a series of lump sum awards which taken together exceed 10 per cent of the average earnings of the employee."

All those in favour, please say "aye."

All those opposed will please say "nay."

In my opinion the nays have it.

Amendment stacked.

On section 4:

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Mr. Bounsall moves in subsection 1 of section 4 of the bill that subsection (b)(i) of section 43 of the act be amended by: in clause (i), replacing $444 with $448; in clause (ii), replacing $480 with $493; in clause (iii), replacing $509 with $523; and adding after clause (iii), "and the amounts payable under this section shall be adjusted from the first day of July in each succeeding year commencing with July 1, 1979, by a percentage amount equal to the percentage change in average wages and salaries in Ontario for the calendar year previous, as indicated by the industrial composite average weekly wages and salaries for Ontario published by Statistics Canada."

Mr. Bounsall: On this point, I am again simply following through in a consistent way with the other types of amendments we have made. Here again the second point is indexing; we have covered that already. In the interest of time, no more need be said about it. The small changes in the amounts contained in the act, which I have made in my proposal, simply reflect once again that I wish to apply not an ad-hoc scale to the changes, not ad-hoc percentages to the changes, but percentages to increases for the permanently totally disabled, percentage increases equal and commensurate with the changes that have occurred in the per cent salaries and wages in each of those three years.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: All those in favour of the amendment will please say "aye."

Those opposed will please say "nay."

In my opinion the nays have it.

Amendment stacked.

On section 5:

Mr. Bounsall: An amendment on section 5(1)—

Hon. B. Stephenson: Which amendment are you using, yours or Mr. Laughren's?

Mr. Bounsall: Mine. Mr. Laughren will be here to move his when the time comes.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Mr. Bounsall has moved that in section 5(1) of the bill, all of the words following "amended" in line three be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "by striking out all the words following 'remunerated' in the amendment of 1975 and substituting therefor, 'and there shall be no maximum rate.'"

Mr. Bounsall: The effect of this amendment is very clear. This is the part of the act which deals with the maximums allowable in earnings of workers on which compensation can be considered and paid. It is, of course, 75 per cent of that. We in this party feel very strongly that there should be no maximum upper level on which compensation and, therefore, pensions via the pension-rating method should be based. There should be absolutely no maximums at all.

The great number of workers who are injured in the work place do not make anything near the $15,000 as indicated as the current maximum. Maybe the board has figures on that, as to what the breakdown is on maximum earnings. I thought I had a document fairly recently in my files which indicated that breakdown by the salaries of those workers who are receiving either compensation or pension benefits at the time of the accident. I am not able this morning to come up with it. I thought I had it, but perhaps the board or the minister could give some indication of just what that breakdown is.

In this matter of increasing the maximums, we're not talking about a very large number of workers; and the principle is that there should be no maximum. If a worker is deprived of his employment in the work place through an accident injury, the whole purpose of the act is to compensate those workers for that loss of income. The fact that we have a factor on it that they would receive 75 per cent of their benefits as non-taxable is not a bad deal when we get to those workers at the upper level, or over the current upper level. I have already suggested to the minister that perhaps there should be some sort of sliding scale in terms of what percentage is given of that non-taxable amount, because workers at that higher level do benefit by the non-taxable portion of that 75 per cent. Perhaps that 75 per cent could be even a smaller percentage for those persons, taking into account the tax which they paid. But clearly there should be no upper maximum whatsoever.

Let me make one final comment. Away back in 1975, when we were dealing with these amendments, one of the arguments made by some of us during the debate, and informally outside the House, was that the maximum should at least be equal to the salary which an MPP makes. We were quite agreeably surprised, after some consultations had taken place before the bill was introduced, when it was raised from $12,000 to $15,000. It appeared to many of us that the argument that it should be at least the salary of an MPP at $15,000 was reasonable and it was accepted. Those salaries have now gone to $20,000. If there is to be a maximum placed in the bill, at least following that philosophy in other years it should be $20,000.

The major point is that there simply should not be a maximum upper limit on which compensation can be paid; and subsequently, if there is a permanent partial disability still remaining, that permanent partial disability, when paid, should be geared to those average earnings of that worker irrespective of how high or how low those average earnings are, except for someone who is working and making well below the minimum wage and needs to have the minimum provisions of the bill applied to him.

In spite of what the Wyatt report recommends, I would hope that this minister, in the first time that she has been before us taking a Workmen's Compensation Board bill through, would see her way clear to accepting the principle that there should be no maximum rate on which compensation should be calculated.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I think I have made all of the comments that really need to be made about the removal of a maximum for workmen's compensation benefits earlier during the second stage debate. Certainly removing the maximum is going to impede the possibility of moving in the direction of a universal insurance program, but I would remind the honourable members there is a very strong recommendation in the Wyatt report that the maximum not be increased at all at this point. We have moved to 125 per cent of the average industrial wage in the province, which it seems to me is a reasonable level for this point. I would hope that that maximum could remain in this bill for the time being until we have examined the rest of the report.

Mr. Bounsall: I have just a point, mechanistically, before we move any further, speaking to the point of how we operate. It might appear that when it comes to a vote, although one always hopes that one's amendment would carry, that this amendment might stand a slight chance of being defeated. I am trying to gather the flavour of the House. If that is the case, my colleague, the member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Laughren) has a second amendment at this point. The normal procedure here, rather than stack this amendment, would be to take a vote on it now. If a method could be found, however, by which he could place his amendment and still have it stacked without taking a vote on it now so that it could all be done at the same time, I presume that members of the House would be appreciative of that. I leave that in the Chairman's capable hands.

[2:00]

Mr. Deputy Chairman: I would point out to the member for Windsor-Sandwich that under normal circumstances if his vote is stacked, we could not take another amendment on the same section. However, with the unanimous consent of the committee of the whole at this time we could do it.

All those in favour of Mr. Bounsall's amendment will please say "aye."

Those opposed will please say "nay."

In my opinion the nays have it.

Shall this vote be stacked?

Mr. Bounsall: It will be stacked on the assumption that we have unanimous consent.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Is there unanimous consent that another amendment can be placed to this clause?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Mr. Chairman, the other amendment is very similar in effect.

Mr. Bounsall: No.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Wait a minute. No, it isn't. Pardon me. It has the same effect, mind you.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: If I do not get unanimous consent, I will have to call in the members.

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Amendment stacked.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Mr. Laughren moves that in section 5(1) of the bill all the words following "amended" in line three be deleted and the following substitute therefor:

"by striking out '$15,000' per annum in the amendment of 1975 and substituting therefor:

"(a) $16,800 effective July 1, 1976;

"(b) $18,500 effective July 1, 1977; and

"(c) $19,600 effective July 1, 1978

"and the amounts indicated in this section shall be adjusted on July 1 in each succeeding year, commencing with July 1, 1979, by the higher of either the same percentage increase granted in subsection 8(c) of section 42 or by appropriate increments of $1,000 when claims data revealed by December 31 of the previous year that 10 per cent or more of workers have earnings that exceed the maximum rate.

Mr. Laughren: I will be very brief, Mr. Chairman. This is based on the model used in Saskatchewan; so we know it works and we know it works well.

Very simply, what it does—to put it in layperson's language—is it says that what's preferable to establishing an arbitrary maximum is to have it so that any time more than 10 per cent of claims are in excess of the existing ceiling, the ceiling would be bumped up in $1,000 increments. That is a very nice way of doing it. It's very neat. It takes the decision-making on levels out of the political arena and makes it automatic. It still allows—which should make the minister happy—for the five, six, seven, eight or nine per cent of people who earn extremely high incomes not to be earning exceptionally high levels on compensation.

Hon. B. Stephenson: In an inflationary period it could get—

Mr. Laughren: All I'm saying is that it's a very nice way of making it an automatic increase and having less than 10 per cent at all times earning above the ceiling.

I don't think the minister knows what percentage will be above the ceiling of $16,200. I don't think she's any idea. If she has, I'd sure like to know.

Hon. B. Stephenson: It can be estimated on the basis of 125 per cent.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Laughren: Yes, but the minister doesn't know, that's the point. She can guesstimate it. But that's something we should know: to what extent certain workers are being excluded.

We know, for example, that there are bonus miners, construction workers and so on, who earn considerably in excess of $16,200. They just happen to be in areas of work where there are high accident rates. I would urge the members to accept this most reasonable amendment.

Mr. McClellan: I simply want to say that the existing ceiling is inadequate to cover and protect construction workers. That's a simple fact; that's a simple reality. I simply want to point that out. As far as I'm concerned, nothing shows the discriminatory nature of workmen's compensation levels more than the imposition of an earnings ceiling which is substantially below what workers actually earn. We are seeking in this amendment to eliminate that discrepancy, that injustice, that class bias in the legislation. I doubt if there is any legislation with respect to pensions affecting professional groups that would incorporate such enormous discrepancies between actual income and insured income, yet we have a Workmen's Compensation Act pension that is grotesquely below the level of actual earnings.

Hon. B. Stephenson: To my knowledge, it is not grotesquely below the average level of earnings. In fact, the vast majority, something over 70 per cent of those who are presently receiving benefits from the Workmen's Compensation Board, would be below the ceiling which is established.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Those in favour of Mr. Laughren's amendment please say "aye."

Those opposed please say "nay."

In my opinion the nays have it.

Amendment stacked.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Mr. Bounsall moves that subsection 2 of section 5 of the bill be amended by deleting in lines two and three the words "on or after the first day of July, 1978 but does not" and substituting therefor, "after the effective dates and nothing therein entitles any person to claim additional compensation for any period prior to the effective dates and does"; and deleting all the words following "act" in the seventh line.

Mr. Bounsall: This amendment is predicated on the fact that subsection 5(1) will carry in the form that the member for Nickel Belt has moved, and that we would then need to change subsection 5(2), as has been done in other parts of the bill when there has been a yearly change, which allows for the change to occur in each one of those particular years, and also would have to have removed from subsection 5(2) the last two and a half lines so that it can be paid out prior to and be eligible for the payment out prior to that first day of July 1978.

Of course, the reasons and the purpose behind this amendment are very obvious, but I just might say in addition that this whole maximum or maximums not brought into line with at least those increases that have been granted to the permanent partial disability pensions is really causing some concern in terms of who will, in fact, be eligible—those who are already on pension—to be able to receive those full amounts even granted by the minister a cumulative total of 27 per cent.

Not only do we need a higher maximum, and this helps to put those different maximums as suggested into place and those payments made, we need those very much because certain workers will be disadvantaged in not being able to get those percentage increases as outlined in section 3 of the bill. I certainly hope that 5(1) carries, bringing forth these necessary amendment changes in 5(2).

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Those in favour of Mr. Bounsall's amendment please say "aye."

Those opposed please say "nay."

In my opinion the nays have it.

Amendment stacked.

On section 6:

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Mr. Bounsall moves that in subsection 1 of section 6 of the bill clause (b) of subsection 3 of section 51 of the act be amended by, in line 1, deleting $192 and substituting therefor $219; and in line 6, deleting $96 and substituting therefor $110.

Mr. Bounsall: Here again, on this amendment, I can find no rationale for the number changes of the ministry in this section. We needn't proceed with the amendment if I can find from the minister a good rationale for these number changes.

The change from what was in the act previously to the $192 clothing allowance in the bill is a 15 per cent increase over that three-year period. The later change to $96 from what was previously in the act set three years ago represents a 14 per cent change only. I did what I could do to find out whether or not the clothing component of the cost of living change cumulatively over those three years came to, in the first instance, 15 per cent and in the second instance, 14 per cent.

This was not the cumulative clothing part only of the consumer price index over those three years. Therefore if it wasn't directly tied to those clothing increases, which is what this amendment speaks to, why did we not have your figures for the other changes that occurred in the bill—a cumulative total of roughly 27 per cent applied to what was in the act before—rather than the 15 and 14 here?

My amendment simply reflects that same percentage which has been used throughout the rest of the bill. It applies to both the amounts that could be paid out in clothing allowance, for lower limb prosthesis and back brace problems and the maximums for the clothing allowance with upper limb prosthesis situations and so on. I wonder why we haven't got the 27 per cent. My calculations make it those figures. If you have a very good reason I would like to hear it. But otherwise why not accept the consistent percentage change you have made throughout?

Hon. B. Stephenson: It is my understanding that the recommendation for this percentage change in regard to the clothing allowance was the recommendation of the joint consultative committee on the basis of their investigations—the study they have done in this area and their personal knowledge of the situation as well. The recommendation I gather was accepted in toto by the board and then recommended to me. I accepted their figure because they had done the study.

Mr. McClellan: What was the study? That doesn't tell us anything.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I don't have the background information.

Mr. McClellan: You don't know?

Mr. Chairman: Does the member for Windsor-Sandwich want to reply to this?

Mr. Bounsall: Yes, if I could. It's too bad this didn't occur in section 1 of the bill so that we would have time for the minister to put the questions back down the line and have it come back up as to why this lower-than-what-would-be-expected percentage change was occurring.

Mr. McClellan: They are cheap.

Mr. Bounsall: It is really a small amount we are dealing with. I am guessing but it is not my impression that everyone with these clothing problems as related to prosthesis comes and gets a complete clothing allowance each year. They usually have to apply for it, the situation is looked at and decided upon. I am sure we are not dealing with 100 per cent of the people who would be eligible for this. It doesn't take very much to increase it. It is the same type of ad hoc-ery again, if there is no explanation for it, which is really an affront.

Hon. B. Stephenson: I am simply saying I don't have the explanation, but they had one.

Mr. Bounsall: The minister should really get it if she can get it quickly. We could probably talk about section 9 of the act meanwhile, if that could be obtained.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, no. I would be perfectly happy to go along with your amendment, as a matter of fact.

Mr. Bounsall: Oh fine, thank you.

Mr. Haggerty: I would like to speak on the amendment. I don't quite agree with the amendment as presented by the member.

I don't think the problem lies in additional benefits given to recipients of workmen's compensation to pay for repairs to clothing and so forth. I think the need is for quicker approval to have braces repaired and to be replaced with new ones. Perhaps it applies to other areas of the body too.

[2:15]

I am well aware that in some cases the board moves with the speed of a snail, and if they went any slower they would be motionless. I suggest that is the area that should be corrected. I can cite cases where doctors have suggested a new brace for the claimant, but for some unknown reason it is six or seven months before any response comes from the Workmen's Compensation Board. I suggest to the members sitting under the gallery over here that they take my remarks most seriously. I think this is an area that they can move in, and perhaps with very little cost to the Workmen's Compensation Board.

Mr. McClellan: Mr. Chairman, before you go on, did I understand the minister to say she was accepting the amendment?

Hon. B. Stephenson: Yes, I can't see any reason for not accepting it.

Mr. Laughren: That's encouraging.

MENTAL HEALTH ACT

Consideration of Bill 19, an Act to amend the Mental Health Act.

On section 1:

Mr. Nixon: The Mental Health Act has had an extensive review in the presence of the minister and the staff by one of the standing committees. One of the highlights of the review of the bill had to do with certain definitions which divided the committee. As nearly as I can tell, they even divided the representatives of the three parties to some extent.

I am informed that the member for York East (Mr. Elgie) had put forward an amendment—

Mr. Bradley: A good man.

Mr. Nixon:—which had, in some sense at least, continued the concepts for the requirements for committal that had been accepted by the community. I understand also the minister had taken a very strong stand on what might have been called an individual civil libertarian basis which was commended and supported by some members of the committee—as a matter of fact, a majority. It is not usual for a bill that has had a thorough review by a standing committee to come before the committee of the whole House unless there are some members in the House who feel that the matter should be settled by the House meeting as a committee of the whole.

That is the case in this instance. It is for that reason that when the bill was reported back from committee it had a reference to this standing committee at my request as the House leader of the Liberal Party.

The amendment we want to put is not to section 1 but I felt it was worthwhile raising it at this time, for probably a very obvious reason. I felt it would give the House an opportunity to reconsider a decision that was made in committee. It could be that the same decision would be reached. But at least the House would have an opportunity, particularly since some members have had a great deal of mail on this bill and on this section, for a last chance to express their view. I hope they would reverse the decision taken by the minister and supported by the committee on division. I would point out again that it was a division that did not go along party lines basically—that there was division in each one of the caucuses.

The matter is of great importance, and because of that my colleague and leader has set aside a great deal of important business so that he would be able to give all of us as members of the House the benefit of his views.

Mr. Eaton: Good stall, Bob.

Section 1 agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3:

Mr. S. Smith: I was tempted to stand outside the chamber and allow my colleague from Brant-Oxford-Norfolk—

Mr. Eaton: To see how long he could go on.

Mr. S. Smith:—to continue to expound on this bill which I know is of very profound interest to him and on which he has spent hours and hours of study and research.

Mr. Eaton: He did better on that than you were doing on agriculture.

Mr. S. Smith: I have had the opportunity to speak to this bill on second reading. I think if members would refer to my words at that time, they would find that I spoke partly, of course, as a member of this House, honoured to have been elected from a constituency, and partly in my previous role, before political life, as a psychiatrist. There is no conflict of interest or anything of this kind in speaking from both those roles because certainly there is no money to be made by amending this bill one way or another. There is no way that one's professional prestige would be enhanced or harmed. It's simply a question of wishing to share with this House some of my feelings based on the years of experience I have had and the many opportunities I have had to operate within the confines of the Mental Health Act as it presently exists.

I feel that the change being brought about in this particular amendment suggested by the minister with regard to section 3, wherein section 8 of the Mental Health Act is being amended, is something we should consider very seriously, particularly in view of the fact that we have already agreed that as part of this bill we have shortened the time necessary for a person to obtain a review of his involuntary status.

It used to be that a person would have 30 days before he could have a hearing, whereas now, thanks to what I think is a progressive move on the part of the minister, that is to be very much shortened; now a person will be able to have a hearing within five days. To some extent, therefore, there is a slight decrease in the degree of pressure that we should feel to change the provisions in the act which determine the criteria for involuntary admission; and to some extent, therefore, since the appeal procedure is so quick and the remedy so obvious, it seems to me that the need to be certain that the net is not being cast too widely, so to speak, has been lessened in intensity. Therefore, we can stop for a moment to reflect on whether there is a real necessity to make a change in the criteria now being applied.

The amendment basically confines the involuntary admission to those situations where a person is felt to be in some physical danger himself due to his illness or that some other person will be in physical danger due to the illness; and it seems to me that unnecessarily restricts the meaning of mental health; it unnecessarily restricts the usefulness of involuntary admission. I believe it will have a very deleterious and serious negative effect on society, very much the opposite of what the minister expects. It's my view that most situations that have arisen over the last several years in terms of complaints, possible abuses or lawsuits, and one thing and another, have related to situations where psychiatrists have failed to keep someone in against his or her will and where the results of that failure have been disastrous.

One does not wish, therefore, to create an atmosphere where psychiatrists will be very much more hesitant in admitting people for proper treatment. Surely one wants to create a situation where a psychiatrist will take the responsibility which society has placed upon him, a responsibility which nobody enjoys having. We want a situation where he or she will take that responsibility with greater ease rather than with enormous fear and trepidation.

I think, particularly, of situations where continued mental illness without proper treatment will lead to something other than just physical harm. I think of situations where the entire development of a child could be very badly affected by having a seriously disturbed mentally ill person, so mentally ill as not to realize the need for treatment, continue to act in close proximity to the child. I think of situations where the resources of the family can be squandered and the reputation of the family and of the individual can be ruined. I think of places where their hopes for the future, their careers and the possibility of their employment can be destroyed by continuing to be untreated. I've had so many experiences where, having treated persons in this state, shortly after treatment they are extremely grateful, and very thankful and realize their complete lack of insight, which was part of the illness and which led them, at first, to resist the treatment making the involuntary admission necessary.

I think of instances where young people have ended their lives and where it was not possible really to predict that that is what would have happened. It was not possible really to say that that was the physical danger that was imminent and yet one knew that there was a very serious disturbance in which the person had no insight, but where one could not genuinely predict that there was a risk to life and limb although there was obviously a serious mental disorder which required treatment.

I believe it's very important, as I say, since we have shortened the review period, which I think is the most important provision of this bill, not to act in haste and not necessarily to constrict the way in which treatment is being given in Ontario, but to allow the process of these reviews under the new act, as the amendments will carry, to go on for a little while and to see whether in the course of these much more frequent and much earlier reviews there are abuses found in which psychiatrists have unnecessarily put people in hospital against their will.

If we find there is a lot of abuse of this kind, then I think we could move to tighten up the criteria. But nothing has indicated to me that this has been a serious matter of practice in Ontario. In the Soviet Union, there have been people committed to mental institutions for political reasons but rarely, if ever, have there been instances of serious abuse in Ontario of people admitted against their will. Frankly, where they have occurred—and I know of some—it seems to me the real problem was it took them 30 days to get a hearing.

Now that the minister has removed that grave injustice, even though there is no one in the province of Ontario any stronger for civil liberties and human rights than I am, since I've stood up in this House on a number of occasions to take a number of stands which are not popular at the moment, I believe very deeply that we will end up actually doing more harm to people by tightening these criteria than we would be doing good for people. I would, therefore, ask that the minister consider agreeing with me that the shortened period of review and the need for a second opinion should be allowed to stand by themselves for some time and to be in practice for some time and that we put to the side the need for revising the criteria which, I believe frankly, could wait until we see how things go with the revised review procedure.

Where a doctor may be tempted to admit someone without proper grounds, he will be somewhat restrained by knowing that within a few days another colleague will be looking at the matter and that within a few days he will have to justify his decision. That's very different from a situation where it was 30 days and the case was probably long done with by the time anybody got around to thinking about it. So there's already a protection being built in here, for which I commend the minister; I feel, therefore, that it's excessive and, in my view, somewhat dangerous to change the criteria.

Therefore, I would move an amendment to section 3 of bill 19, amending section 8(1) of the Mental Health Act. I may just say parenthetically that the amendment I am about to present is the amendment from the Ontario Council of Health. It's an amendment which I gather my colleague from Renfrew North (Mr. Conway) at one point presented briefly in the committee but, when faced with what he thought was a threat to withdraw the bill should such an amendment pass—

Mr. Nixon: Threat to withdraw?

Mr. S. Smith: Well, I say what he thought was a threat. It may or may not have been. I don't wish to be unfair to the minister. At that point, he withdrew the amendment but I wish to put it now.

I will draw my remarks to a close by saying that I sincerely hope this amendment will carry, keeping in mind that we can always change the criteria once we have had a little experience with the newly toughened review procedures and that one would not wish to cause psychiatrists to be too hesitant to apply treatment to those who would otherwise be in imminent danger other than just physical danger.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. S. Smith moves that section 3 of the bill be amended by deleting section 8(1) of the act and substituting the following therefor:

"8(1) Where a physician examines a person and the physician is of the opinion that the person is apparently suffering from a mental disorder of a nature or quality that requires immediate hospitalization in order to prevent (a) serious harm to the mental or physical condition of such person or (b) serious harm to the mental or physical condition of another person and such person is not suitable for admission as an informal patient, the physician may make application in the prescribed form for a psychiatric assessment of the person."

Mr. Breaugh: Mr. Chairman, the matter of the substance of the amendment as proposed was a matter of considerable debate; in fact, it was the centre of the debate during the committee proceedings. It's true, as the member for Brant-Oxford-Norfolk pointed out, the matter was a rather contentious one because the bill focuses on this set of criteria. On this is built the review period and the review mechanism, and this is a substantive alteration from the current Mental Health Act.

It was, I might say, not simply a matter of discussion and contention during the three weeks or so of committee work that was done but has been discussed for some time previously, because the main set of criteria that is proposed in the act has been well known throughout the province for a considerable number of months, and at least in my office it has been the centre of a great deal of discussion and representation from virtually all interest groups that could conceivably be involved in this Mental Health Act.

It's also true, I think, to agree that there is a group of people who do not want this criterion narrowed, and that turns out to be essentially the professionals working in the field, psychiatrists mostly. In some instances some members of the law society are a little upset with it as well. It does certainly restrict their—I hesitate to use the word "freedom," but their ability and responsibility to enact their professional judgement in a larger area. It confines that. It makes the criteria much more specific than this amendment proposes.

During the course of listening to representations from several people, from patients, from people who are interested in mental health, from mental health organizations, and from people who work in mental health institutions, it becomes apparent that there are some abuses of the current Mental Health Act. If we don't want to use the term abuses, then we certainly have to accept that there is some confusion about what precisely we mean by safety or harm or serious harm, as used in this particular amendment, and to question whether that in itself isn't causing a great many problems. There is no certainty applied by the law.

We get to the basic position as legislators that we are not here to act in a professional capacity as psychiatrists. But we are here certainly to represent the society in which we live and to say that under certain sets of circumstances we will withdraw, not just some but virtually all the rights that some other member of our society might have. That is an extremely serious thing.

I wouldn't run the gamut and say the thing is abused in a political sense. I don't think that's true. I don't think it is consciously abused by professionals working in the field either, but I do think there is a great deal of confusion surrounding the interpretation of the present criteria and that they would be made much more difficult by the ones proposed in this amendment.

At the end of the committee session, I think that we did have consensus, even from the Liberal members of the committee who, at that time, proposed a similar amendment during the course of the committee hearings. Because it becomes evident that as we broaden the criteria, as we move into words such as are used here, "serious harm," for instance, it becomes hazier and hazier. We begin to make value judgements, not on someone's physical and mental wellbeing, but on their lifestyle and how they choose to dress, how they choose to act and how they choose to relate to those around them.

It soon becomes a clear indication that it causes confusion in itself and it is not operable. One can't work under those circumstances. Each time someone proposed an amendment—and there were amendments proposed by both Conservative and Liberal members of the committee—each time this was done, when what those amendments would mean were discussed and examined, we got into grey areas that would cause eventual difficulties. The committee kept reverting to the original words proposed by the minister in this section, and I think for good reason.

We go back to those, because in order to make that judgement and to make it clear and without argument, we need to have a severely restricted set of criteria, as laid down in the original proposal by the minister. That does cause difficulty for some people working in the professional field. The minister responded during the course of the hearings that there were other acts that should and can be applied. They are not now used. The blanket wording that is in the present Mental Health Act is used for safety.

I confess openly and honestly to all concerned that it was a matter of some considerable contention within our own caucus. We heard representation from patients, from people who work in the field of mental health and from the professionals who are involved. There are differing opinions. What we came to in the end is that society has to make some kind of a value judgement and come to a consensus that says, "Under this very limited set of conditions, we are prepared to say that certain people need to have their rights taken away from them. But we want that set of conditions to be extremely narrow in scope. We do not want them to be open even to the most conscientious psychiatrist to make his or her personal value judgement on a patient."

We support the original proposition that is included in Bill 19. We support it because once you get off that position you get yourself into great difficulty. We do not impugn the motives of professionals working in the field. We are simply saying that as legislators we are prepared to say to a segment of our society: "For your own good and the good of those around you, you may need to be involuntarily committed." But we are also saying that the scope of that kind of treatment should be extremely narrow and that other acts should be used if they need to be used. The government should not provide in legislation a confusing and rather broad set of criteria for this definition.

We will not support the amendment. We do appreciate the spirit in which it was given, because that was evident during the course of the committee hearings and, I think, in almost every representation that was made to me. There are a few people in our society who think that this is a simplistic problem; it is a very difficult one. But it needs strict sets of criteria as proposed in this act.

Frankly, the remainder of the revisions to the Mental Health Act that are carried out in Bill 19 are dependent upon a severe and limited set of criteria. The time period, in my view, will not work if we change the criteria, nor will the review board mechanisms that have been put in place be nearly as effective if you broaden these criteria because this is one act that hangs together. There is a good deal of interdependence from one section to the other.

So, in summary, we appreciate the intent put forward in this amendment and we understand the seriousness of the problem, but that is compounded even more should you accept this amendment, and we will not support it. We will support the criteria that were put forth in the original Bill 19.

Mr. Bradley: Speaking very briefly to this, Mr. Chairman, in the interests of the time confinements we have this afternoon, I would speak in support of the amendment put forward by the leader of the official opposition.

Certainly, in my own experience with the representations that have been made to me as a member of the provincial Legislature and previous to that as a member of a municipal council, in dealing with people on an individual basis there are many people within my constituency who felt—as odd as it may sound to the minister and others who are very much in favour of this bill—that the criteria that presently exist before the passing of this bill were in some cases inadequate to deal with problems they had within their own families.

I have not, from my own constituency, had more than one representation made indicating there was a serious abuse of this or that the appeal mechanism which presently exists was inadequate. As the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out, even the narrowing of the definition is serious in itself, but it is much more serious when coupled with the reduction in the number of days in which involuntary confinement can take place without a second opinion.

The opposition which has been shown by members of the medical profession, by the Ontario Medical Association, by psychiatrists, by those who had the responsibility of delivering psychiatric services in the province of Ontario, is a clear indication from people who are experts in the field that there is great concern about the proposals contained within this act and it is a concern which I think would be alleviated to a certain extent by the amendment as proposed by the Leader of the Opposition.

I note also that a gentleman who was held in a good deal of repute by my friends to the left for a number of years as a member of this Legislature, Dr. Morton Shulman, wrote an article on May 9, 1978, in the Toronto Sun indicating his grave concern about this particular bill and expressing the hope that members of the Legislature would not proceed with it to its fruition.

I would also mention another individual who is, I think, held in a great deal of repute by all members of this House—I refer to the member for York East (Mr. Elgie) who has expressed grave reservations and who, indeed, was instrumental in dealing with an amendment which would, I think, have improved the bill from what it is at the present time.

Taking into consideration the representations made by these people of reputation, by people who are very respected, and taking into consideration the fact that at the present time in the province of Ontario we have some difficulty expressed by families who have individuals who obviously require psychiatric care but are not compelled to receive that psychiatric care, I would strongly recommend to the House the support of this particular amendment.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: I will try to be brief. May I first of all start off by saying the committee process in which we all took part was one of the least partisan, most interesting, most productive sessions that I have participated in in the seven years that I have been a member of this assembly.

As has already been pointed out by several of the earlier speakers, on this particular matter it was one that really wasn't bound by party lines at all. There were, in fact, expressions pro and con in all three caucuses.

[2:45]

I may say, as well, this is a subject to which I have given a great deal of thought and about which I have had a great deal of concern for some time. In proposing legislation of this kind one is very mindful of the kinds of things that are said and have been said, for instance, by the Leader of the Opposition, that perhaps what we're doing in trying to cure a situation is prescribing a remedy that is worse. One is always mindful of that.

I was persuaded, in evaluating the Mental Health Act, that there were certain areas in which I had to act as soon as possible rather than wait for the conclusion of the work of the Ontario Council of Health task force on the Mental Health Act and mental health services, which report may well be as much as a year or two years away.

There were a number of items that were recommended to me by my staff and which we reviewed in determining what would go first into Bill 124 and then into Bill 19 which I determined could wait and about which, frankly, I wasn't prepared to take a position at this time, one way or another, on a variety of things. This is one I felt very strongly had to be addressed at this time.

It concerns me that a number of the arguments which are advanced by my friend the Leader of the Opposition, and which I have seen advanced in a number of the letters I have received, centre on a couple of arguments, namely, those to do with financial loss, embarrassment to the family and so forth. I have received about 1,200 letters on this subject—admittedly, mostly from doctors and mostly expressing concern about the bill. I have replied to those 1,200 letters now, and we're starting to get letters back from some saying they now understand what we're trying to do and they support it. I don't expect that will be universal.

It concerns me when I hear some of these arguments about financial loss and these other things, because if one looks at the present act and at the present criteria, which revolve around the question of safety, I have some considerable difficulty accepting the notion that one could construe safety to mean the squandering of one's personal finances; that one could construe safety to mean the loss of a professional reputation or the damaging of a professional reputation.

In looking at those arguments, I had to go back in my mind—and I did—to review why we had decided to put this into Bill 124 in the first place. It really goes back to about 1975 when the ministry, through an outside consultant and then internally, started to poll the people in our psychiatric hospitals, who after all, have to live with the Mental Health Act, to find out what problems there were with the act itself. Not everyone made comments and not everyone made this comment, but the most frequently heard comment was that the criteria for involuntary committal under section 8 of the Mental Health Act were too vague and they had to be clarified.

That leads to another concern I have with some of the arguments advanced opposite. It's not a question of trying to cut down on the number of involuntary admissions. It's not a question of trying to increase the number of involuntary admissions. It's not a narrowing or a broadening which we seek, but a clarification. I suppose that's the principal concern I have with the proposed amendment: it is not clear, it is vague; it is very broad, perhaps even broader than the present criteria of the Mental Health Act.

It seems to me that we as legislators, on a subject as important as the deprivation of personal liberty, owe it to the people of this province and to the people who must make this act work, to speak clearly, and that is the purpose of Bill 19, the purpose of section 3 in particular.

It has been suggested that the only way that persons are going to find themselves committed involuntarily now is if they have, in fact, committed an overt physical act. That again, I submit to you, is a misunderstanding, perhaps an understandable misunderstanding if I can put it that way, of the way section 3 of the amended section 8 is set out. For whatever reason, those who read that section and decide to oppose it never seem to get to subsection (c), where it talks about a person having shown or showing a lack of competence to care for himself and then going on to ask the physician to form an opinion—not a firm prediction, an opinion, a medical judgement—that the person is “apparently suffering from a mental disorder of a nature or quality that likely will result,” and then it goes on from there.

I've had the argument advanced to me by some on other sides that section 8, subsection (c) is, in fact, too broad, but it is there to provide for medical judgement. It is there to provide for the individual physician—and let's not forget that we're not talking about psychiatrists for the most part when we talk about section 8. We are talking for the most part about family practitioners, who will only deal with this kind of a problem very infrequently in any given year and for whose benefit, I suggest again, we must speak clearly. It is there to provide for that family physician or to provide for that psychiatrist the latitude for a professional judgement within these very clear criteria.

The final thing I want to mention has to do with the notion that this is somehow a civil libertarian bill, as opposed to what, I don't know. I have never, from the beginning of the process, professed to represent either the medical point of view or the civil libertarian point of view. Rather, as a layman who happens at this time to be the Minister of Health, I have had to evaluate the situation from the point of view of a concerned citizen, a representative of the people, and consider how I would want myself, my family, my constituents to be dealt with in this very significant area. It is, instead, a very sincere effort on my part and on the part of the government to speak clearly to the profession, in fact, to assist the profession to make proper judgements of who should or should not be deprived of their liberty for whatever period of time.

I understand the argument advanced by my friend from Hamilton West about leaving this alone because we've reduced the period of initial confinement. I suggest to you, sir, that if the review process is to work properly, whatever the period of initial confinement, then the criteria for first admission and the criteria for the review of whether that person should be detained longer must again be clear. An improved review process is really no improvement at all if the criteria are vague, and we serve no one whom we seek to serve if we leave it in that way.

One final point I would make is, recognizing the concerns of members opposite and people beyond this building, in committee I mentioned, and I repeat this commitment, that we will track very carefully, through whatever research means possible, the best possible, the application of the revised criteria.

Mr. S. Smith: The number of psychiatrists in Ontario, too.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Mr. Chairman, with respect, and I don't want to get partisan because none of the discussion on this has become partisan, but the honourable member makes that kind of an observation which would lead one to believe that the present criteria are somehow all-inclusive; that one can stop any eventuality, any tragedy, with the present criteria, and clearly that's not so.

Mr. S. Smith: Of course not.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: I hope the House will see fit not to accept the amendment. I can assure members that we will track this very closely. I am confident that this is not going to inhibit medical judgement. I am confident that this, in fact, will be an assist in making a medical judgement as to what we as legislators, as representatives of the province and of society, intend should be the proper use of the right to take away someone's liberty and commit that person to a psychiatric facility.

Mr. S. Smith: Let it be on your head.

Mr. Sweeney: Are we still on the same amendment, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Chairman: That's the amendment that is before the committee.

Mr. Sweeney: I think the minister knows quite well the position that I took in committee on this particular amendment. I sense very clearly from what he has just said the position he is taking. I must reiterate two points, however.

The first point relates to the minister's rather frequent reference to the word "clarification." I must remind the minister that on several occasions during the committee hearings, the minister himself posed to the witnesses that the existing definition of the word "safety" in the present act, in his judgement, would not allow physicians or psychiatrists, as the case may be, to involuntarily commit people for a number of purposes which he described. I am not going to go through them all; the minister knows what I am talking about. But I ask the minister to please remember that, time and time again, those witnesses told him that he was wrong; that, under the old definition, they could commit—

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order: If the honourable member will check Hansard, what I did on a number of occasions was to ask them how they defined safety to include a variety of situations, because again it seems to me the word "safety" is so vague that it does need clarifying. That's what I did. It was not to challenge but rather to ask them to explain how, for the edification of the committee, they used "safety" to cover a pretty broad field.

Mr. Chairman: That sounds like a point of privilege.

Mr. Sweeney: Very well, if the minister wants to put it in those words. The point I am trying to make is that the difference between the minister's understanding of how safety should be interpreted and how, in fact, it was being interpreted, was rather great. I think that's an important point. I raise that only because, in my judgement, the version we now have goes far beyond just clarifying what was there before. As a matter of fact, I would suggest that we have gone from one extreme to the other. The present bill, as we heard in the committee, allows for a wide interpretation. In this bill we are narrowing the present interpretation down to a point where we are going to severely limit the possibility of physicians—and remember we're talking about skilled, trained, competent physicians—to make a medical judgement.

The second point I want to make is that by narrowing it down to bodily injury, we are raising once again the spectre of associating mental illness with physical violence. I think that's a mistake.

Thirdly, by not recognizing that a mentally ill person can do far more damage to another person in a mental or an emotional way than he can in a physical way, we are refusing to recognize the kind of damage that can be done. As my colleague from Renfrew North pointed out in the committee, we are simply going to exchange one group of victims for another. I would suggest that's not a very good exchange, and earnestly urge the minister to consider the amendment put forward by my leader.

Mr. Chairman: Any further comments on this amendment?

All those in favour will say "aye."

All those opposed will say "nay."

In my opinion the nays have it.

Amendment stacked.

Mr. Chairman: Are there any further comments, questions or amendments to any other section of the bill?

Mr. S. Smith: A terrible step backward. Who persuaded you to do this?

Sections 4 to 21, inclusive, agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: I would inform the committee that we have three bills before the committee. There are a number of votes that have been stacked. The bells will ring for up to 10 minutes.

CROWN TIMBER AMENDMENT ACT

(concluded)

Mr. Chairman: The first vote is on Bill 35, An Act to amend the Crown Timber Act. It has been moved by Mr. Foulds that section 4 of the bill renumbered as section 5 be amended by adding thereto the following subsections:

"(2) On or after the first day of July 1979 where a regulation is made under clauses (c) or (d) of subsection 1, the minister shall, within 15 days after the regulation is filed with the registrar of regulations, lay a copy of the regulation before the assembly if it is in session or, if not, within 15 days after the commencement of the next ensuing session and the assembly shall by resolution approve or amend the regulation.

“(3) An approval of a regulation by a resolution under subsection 2 is effective from the day that the regulation came into force.

“(4) An amendment to a regulation by a resolution under subsection 2 is effective from the day that the regulation came into force or from such other day thereafter that the assembly may specify in the resolution.

“(5) Where a regulation is amended by a resolution under subsection 2 the Lieutenant Governor in Council shall give effect to the resolution by making an amending regulation in accordance with the resolution and such amending regulation need not be laid before the assembly.”

The committee divided on Mr. Foulds' amendment to section 4 of the bill, which was negated on the following vote:

Ayes 18; nays 37.

Section 4 agreed to.

Bill 35, as amended, reported.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION AMENDMENT ACT

(concluded)

The committee divided on Mr. Bounsall's amendment to subsections 2 and 3 of section 1 of the bill which was negated by the same vote.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might just take a minute to make one or two comments in connection with the balance of the afternoon, in case there are those who didn't get a copy of the latest program.

We had some discussions over the luncheon break and at the appropriate time I have agreed to bring in a motion that we would take into consideration sessional paper 162, which will provide a vehicle for the debate on the automotive industry. The agreement is that the debate would conclude at 6 p.m. The opposition parties wanted some opportunity to complete their research. We then agreed there would be some opportunity for the member for Nickel Belt.

BUDGET DEBATE

Resumption of the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. Laughren: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to take part in the budget debate and to lay before the members of the Legislature some of our alternatives. I understand the problem of time constraints this afternoon and I shall make every effort to make my remarks as concise as possible, while at the same time doing justice to the seriousness of the problem we face in Ontario.

The purpose of a provincial budget is to lay before the Legislature the fiscal and monetary intentions of the government on a yearly basis. It is undoubtedly the most important single indicator of a government's ideological, social and economic commitment.
 It should also address the principle of economic as well as fiscal problems facing our society.

Before the Ontario Treasurer (Mr. Mc-Keough) brought in his 1978 budget, I suspect there would have been general agreement among most people, including the Treasurer, as to the major problems we face in Ontario. I suspect there would have been agreement that unemployment in excess of 325,000 was the number one problem. I suspect the state of our manufacturing industries would be another area of agreement. Employment simply is not expanding in manufacturing the way it should be. I suspect we would have been in agreement that the auto pact had to be enforced in order to provide our fair share of jobs, investment, research and development in Ontario. I suspect as well that the ills of our resource industries would also have been agreed upon as a problem area.

So, given such common ground, how is it that we disagree so profoundly on how to resolve these problems? The answer is simply that the Conservatives are convinced that our economy can be saved only by the private sector. Thus we have in Ontario serious problems with which the Treasurer refuses to deal because of his blind faith in the private enterprise system.

This debate would not be so important if the private sector was investing in Ontario, was creating jobs in Ontario, was exporting manufactured goods from Ontario, doing research and development in Ontario, and building a strong, labour-intensive manufacturing base in Ontario. But the private sector has not done that and has given us no indication that it intends to.

Despite this, the Treasurer insists that the way to cure our economic ills is to rely on that same private sector that got us into this mess. Surely it would be naive of us to believe that the auto manufacturers, of their own volition, will give us a fair share of jobs, retooling investment, and research and development expenditures. We would be naive if we believed that resource corporations are going to willingly diversify, further refine and introduce a policy of buy-Canadian purchasing.

[3:30]

I want today to offer a critique of the Treasurer's budget, an analysis of the Ontario economy and a presentation of our alternatives. Let me assure members that we are serious about our alternatives. We are appalled at the lack of imagination and courage shown by the Treasurer in his 1978 budget. We are appalled at his taxing policy, his tax exemptions and concessions, and his lack of initiative in creating jobs for Ontario's unemployed. There is no better symbol of the Treasurer's incompetence in handling of the Ontario budget, and the Ontario economy, than the dismal performance of his revenue estimates for last year.

We can make allowances for the original estimates he made in 1977; after all, that was an election year. I am sure he would view the $700 million-plus drop in his taxation revenue expectations in 1977, from April 1977 to budget time this year, as a bit of harmless puffery designed to make the voters feel happier in the weeks leading up to the 1977 election. After all, it would have been hard for the government to play budget balancer with a projected deficit of $350 million higher than 1976-77 figure.

So as I said, we can make allowances for the figures the Treasurer used at budget time last year, he had a higher political purpose in mind when he created them; but we cannot take the same charitable approach to this year's budget, and the figures he used this year are disastrously off. At budget time, on March 7, he was projecting total revenues of $6.881 billion for 1977-78. Barely one month later, the documents released along with the Treasurer's response to the federal budget showed a drop in expected tax revenues of $225 million down to $6.656 billion. The first update of the budget projections for 1978-79 are not public yet, but they are sure to show a similar pattern for this year's figures.

The overall figures show the Treasurer's incompetency in budgeting. The details reflect a steady deterioration of the Ontario economy and the failure of the government's economic policies. Corporation tax revenue dropped from $966 million estimated at budget time in 1977, to $877 million at budget time this year, and then dropped a further $140 million in the April 1978 estimates.

This shortfall in revenues in last year's budget is bad news for the Treasurer's projections for 1978-79. In addition to the change in the figures for 1977-78, on which those projections were based, the Treasurer has had to back part way down on his OHIP increase and has given up $144 million in sales tax revenues in conjunction with the federal budget.

Our analysis suggests that he has lost $647 million in revenues—$141 million from OHIP, $144 million from the sales tax cut and $362 million from the deterioration of the economy. Instead of the deficit of $1.36 billion projected in March, the figures now available suggest that it will be in the $1.8 billion to $1.9 billion range. So much for the Treasurer's budget calculations.

The Treasurer has not done any better in his overall economic forecasts. Since his March budget, the Conference Board in Canada and other forecasting agencies have revised their predictions for Canada downwards. The conference board's forecast of growth for Ontario has been reduced from 5.1 per cent to 4.2 per cent. In his budget the Treasurer forecast unemployment at 280,000, a slight improvement over last year. So far this year, the number of unemployed has not been below 300,000, hitting a record of 345,000 in March. Even the Treasurer must now acknowledge that his failure to propose any job-creation measures in his budget would do great harm to an already weak economy. Even the Treasurer's student-job-creation program has run into trouble. He underestimated the need for the assistance, but rather than extend the program he cut it off.

At budget time he made a great to-do about having no need for public borrowing this year. In his response to the federal budget on April 10, he acknowledged that some bargaining would be necessary to "facilitate our cash flow." Then just the day before yesterday, he announced that the government would be borrowing on a regular basis this year.

He made a proposal for assistance for research and development, and indicated that Ontario wanted to proceed along these lines immediately; but even the federal government's pathetic non-proposal of April 10 was enough to satisfy the Treasurer and he dropped the idea.

No more than three pages of a very thin, 20-page budget speech by the Treasurer dealt with municipal finance, property tax reform and property tax relief for senior citizens. Just two weeks ago he completed his retreat on assessment reform. In doing so he not only chose quite deliberately to ignore a number of real problems with the present system that could be resolved without major tax reform but he also underlined the cynicism of the government's view of revenue-sharing and property tax relief.

Having redefined the so-called Edmonton commitment last September, he declared that Ontario would take any money it would have to use to pay taxes on its property as a result of tax reform out of the money it would otherwise pay in grants. In other words, municipal taxpayers would have to pay to Ontario government property taxes. And he raised cynicism to new heights when he tied property tax credit changes to the acceptance of his tax package.

Finally, he was forced by this Legislature to back down on the measure that became the symbol of his budget: the 37.5 per cent OHIP premium increase. He did so without grace. In typical Tory fashion he chose to save money by destroying jobs. His growth figures are inflated, his revenue estimates are inflated and his policies—from health care premiums to mining taxes—have been shot down in flames. Ontario deserves more than a Treasurer who refuses to face reality or whose policies lack the confidence of his colleagues on both sides of the Legislature.

The budget lies in tatters; there isn't a page of it that means anything today. That makes its failure to deal with building the Ontario economy in the longer term even more serious.

At the first ministers' conference in February of this year, the government of Ontario was one of the main proponents of belt-tightening in government. It was not surprising that the March budget boasted of checked growth of government spending and a pledge to balance the budget by 1981. On the flipside of this well-worn record about public sector restraint is the Treasurer's tune about "reducing regulation to free up resources and initiative for the public sector." The Treasurer has been addressing luncheons around the province proclaiming that they are "targeting for a balanced budget to make room in the economy for the private sector to grow and flourish."

There is both an ideological and an economic element behind the Treasurer's chorus. The ideological element is quite simply explained by the Tories' aversion to anything but the free enterprise approach to the economy. The vociferousness of their current proclamations has been triggered by the realization that government activities have grown to the point where they now represent 33 per cent of the gross provincial product in Ontario. This growth of the public sector has been noted in other provinces of Canada and in the United States. In both countries the inspiration for an ideological attack on the growth of government and a call for a return to the free market for all economic activity has come from the so-called Chicago school of economic thought. It is clear that it has caught on in economic circles in the government of Ontario, and particularly with the Treasurer.

The economic reasons behind the Ontario government's move towards public sector restraint are more complicated. At the root of the problem is the fact that the Tories have mismanaged the economy of Ontario in the postwar period. It is finally catching up with them.

The economy of Ontario today is characterized by a largely foreign-owned and export-oriented resource sector, a largely foreign-owned and underdeveloped manufacturing sector and an over-extended service sector. The service sector now accounts for 64.5 per cent of Ontario's labour force, including the 19 per cent which is in the government sector. That leaves only 35 per cent of the labour force working in commodity-producing sectors. But it is this sector that produces the wealth which underpins the rest of the economy. The result is a distinct upper limit to the number of service jobs Ontario can support.

Yet when the resource and manufacturing sectors of the economy have failed to create employment opportunities because of this slower-than-average growth, or actual decline, the government has been forced to step in to create jobs as the employer of last resort. Governments in other western countries have also played this role, but Canadian governments have been especially critical in this role as a job provider because of the huge structural difficulties associated with our dependence on the United States.

In the period 1966-76, the public sector in Ontario absorbed about 30 per cent of the new entrants into the labour force. Government employment now accounts for 19 per cent of the total in Ontario. The startling fact is that manufacturing industries only account for about 24 per cent.

In the 1970s the Ontario government has been faced with the problems of both a sluggish economy and inflation. The safety valve of further expanding the public sector no longer exists for the government of Ontario. We are now witnessing the results in the Treasurer's restraint and austerity programs.

Another reason the Treasurer is getting fidgety about the size of the activities of government is related to Canada's dismal overall trade performance. Traditionally, Canada and Ontario have relied on exports of raw materials in Ontario, nickel and other minerals, pulp, newsprint and lumber, and hydro-electricity to offset our trade deficit in manufactured goods. However, by 1975 the rise in imports of manufactured goods could not be covered by resource exports, resulting in a merchandise trade deficit of $500 million that year in Canada.

While Canada had a merchandise trade surplus in 1976-77, this was offset by large deficits on service payments for the foreign capital borrowed and on tourism. All this adds up to a huge and increasing deficit on the current account, over $4 billion in each of the past three years. The response of the government of Ontario, along with other Canadian governments, has been to turn to the United States and European money markets for more capital to cover the debt. In theory, the new borrowings are to be put into new resource projects on which will be based new exports which will in turn cut the level of the current account deficit.

In 1976 Canadian corporations and governments borrowed $9.2 billion abroad, greatly exceeding borrowing by any other country. Ontario Hydro has required large sums of borrowed capital from the United States; $530 million in 1975-76, $260 million in 1976-77, and $392 million in 1977-78. That latter is an interim figure. The effect of these ever increasing borrowings on individual Canadians and on businesses is a burden in the form of higher interest rates which have led to a higher cost of living and a higher cost of doing business. The effect of these ever-increasing borrowings on government is that an increasing proportion of their total expenditure is spent paying the interest on the public debt. In Ontario in 1975-76 the interest on the public debt was $725 million or 6.9 per cent of all expenditures. In 1977-78 it has reached over $1 billion and eight per cent of total expenditure. Interest on the public debt was the only expenditure to increase its proportion of total spending between 1975-76 and the 1977-78 budget years.

For all Canadian provincial governments, the average real growth rate for interest on the public debt was 13.4 per cent from the period 1961-76 whereas expenditure on goods and services grew at 10.7 per cent. In these circumstances it comes as no surprise that the squeeze is being put on other government services and expenditures, nor is it surprising that the Ministry of the Treasury, Economics and Intergovernmental Affairs is trying to avoid further deficits of any kind. The situation substantially cuts down the Treasurer's room to manoeuvre, but it cannot serve as an excuse since the Conservative government is responsible for mismanaging the economy and getting us into this mess in the first place. They must take full responsibility for allowing a structure of a weak productive sector and an over-developed service sector to persist. They now have to face the reality that public spending and more borrowing will no longer prop up a shaky provincial economy. The implication of doing so is that more and more of our future will be mortgaged to pay for past errors.

What is happening to Ontario's economy? During 1977, real growth in the Ontario economy is estimated to have been only three per cent, compared with almost five per cent in 1976. Capital investment has continued to be sluggish. Unemployment increased to seven per cent as the job-creation rate lagged behind labour force growth. Trouble spots can be identified in the mining, manufacturing, agricultural, construction and public administration sectors. The steel industry has had two years of stagnant demand and like the pulp and paper industry has been operating at only 80 per cent capacity.

Consumer spending, which accounts for nearly 55 per cent of the gross provincial product, is weak, with retail sales for Ontario showing only modest gains in the third quarter of the year. During 1977 the Ontario labour force averaged more than four million participants, of whom about 3.8 million were employed. The annual growth rates for the labour force and employment were approximately three per cent and two per cent respectively.

The provincial unemployment rate fluctuated between 6.2 per cent and 7.4 per cent during 1977, a significant rise over the previous year's range of 5.7 per cent to 6.5 per cent. The unemployment rate among males increased from 5.1 per cent in 1976 to 5.9 per cent in 1977, while that for females jumped from 7.8 per cent to 8.6 per cent. The highest unemployment rate by far is in the 15-24 age group, at 13 per cent for the year. The current unemployment rate in Ontario is running at about 7.5 per cent, seasonally adjusted.

The outlook for Ontario's unemployment in the short run is not very bright. Indications suggest even higher unemployment rates than those experienced so far. Ontario's weak and unbalanced economic structure is best reflected in the figures for employment by industry. Less than two per cent of the total labour force is employed in forestry and mining, our key export industries. Personal and community service industries employ more people—28.7 per cent of the total—than do manufacturing industries at about 26 per cent. Direct government employment has risen to 7.3 per cent of total employment. If you take all government-related employment, including health, education and so forth, Mr. Speaker, it's actually closer to about 20 per cent.

Employment in agriculture, other primary industries, transportation, communication, and utilities, as well as manufacturing, all exhibited negative or no growth in 1977. The construction, trade, service, public administration, finance, insurance and real estate industries showed positive performance. This poor performance in productive, relative to service, sectors is not peculiar to 1977. A comparison of the employment figures by industry in 1967 and 1977 gives us an idea of the underlying trends in the structure of the Ontario economy.

Overall employment in all productive sectors, including agriculture was 40.9 per cent of total employment in 1967. By 1977, this percentage had dropped to 32.9 per cent. Correspondingly, employment in nonproductive sectors, including banking, finance, real estate, community and personal services, government trade and transportation, has risen from 59.1 per cent to 67.1 per cent of total employment. It is to be noted that the wealth-absorbing work now employs over two thirds of the labour force in Ontario, leaving only one third of the work force in wealth-creating activities.

Employment as a percentage of total employment has actually declined over this period in each specific industrial sector, mining, forestry, manufacturing and construction. Manufacturing is the most noteworthy, showing a decline of seven per cent from 33.2 per cent to 26.3 per cent. Manufacturing then is Ontario's poorest performer over the past decade. There is a similar trend for all of Canada. As a matter of fact, employment in manufacturing as a percentage of total employment dropped from 23.4 per cent to 19.5 per cent in 1978. The decline is greatest in Ontario, and this is the home of half of the nation's manufacturing output.

For 1978, manufacturing in Ontario is expected to grow at 4.5 per cent, compared with three per cent in 1977. Strong performances are hoped for in pulp and newsprint, chemical and plastic products, primary metals, metal fabricating and transportation. The devaluation of the Canadian dollar is expected to assist in creating an improved international competitive position as well as making domestic products more attractive to Canadian consumers. The Alaska highway pipeline construction is expected to make its initial impact felt on the Ontario economy by the third and fourth quarters. In the interim, strengthening consumer demand should continue to keep the manufacturing sector buoyant.

Such rosy forecasts are dubious in the light of the underlying trend over the past decade of steadily reduced employment in the key sectors. Furthermore, the chief industry, the auto parts and assembly industry, is in trouble in the long term because Canada is not receiving its fair share of parts production nor its fair share of research and development and investment. The stimulative effect of the devaluation of the dollar will be only short lived. In the longer run, we will experience inflationary pressures because of the increased costs of imports and increased cost of borrowing foreign capital.

Finally, there is a sluggish investment in the Ontario manufacturing industries, in part because the Treasurer has adopted a free trade stance with little evidence that industrial adjustment programs to help industries adapt to freer trade will be either significant or helpful. He is going around the province stating that it will be the industrial heartland of this country, and Ontario in particular, which will have to bear most of the burden in adjusting to freer trade. While he does throw out platitudes to the effect that effective leadership and adjustment assistance will help us adjust, the manufacturers of this province are understandably uncertain about the future.

In the budget presented to us in March, the Treasurer also predicted favourable economic prospects for 1978 and 1979, with real growth estimated at 4.3 per cent for 1978 and 5.5 per cent for 1979. He forecasted a strong export performance, the creation of 100,000 jobs, a small decline in unemployment and a steady expansion of private sector jobs and private sector prosperity. Studies exist, however, prepared even in the Treasurer's own ministry, that assume no such healthy private sector or industrial growth over the next decade.

In a report issued in June 1976 by the Treasurer's department entitled, A Long Term Projection of Ontario's Industrial Development Pattern, we can see what the assumptions of the government really are with respect to future employment trends in various sectors of the economy and thus the prospects for growth in those sectors. The report pointed out that while in 1961 the manufacturing sector of the Ontario economy employed 30.7 per cent of the labour force, by the mid-1970s this proportion had fallen to 24.6 per cent. The report predicted that by 1985 only 20.1 per cent of provincial employment will be in the manufacturing sector and that by 1995 the proportion will be down to 16 per cent.

What does this mean for job creation in the eyes of the Treasurer's department? While in the 1960s annual employment in manufacturing grew in the province by 2.3 per cent, in the 1970s the growth rate has fallen off to 0.7 per cent a year. Since 1974, in fact, there has been a decline. For the future, the Treasury department report projected that job creation in manufacturing will be much below that in the 1960s and that output growth in manufacturing will continue to slow down over the next two decades.

The Ontario Economic Council has more recently come up with similar projections for employment to 1987. According to its calculations, commercial services will account for 32 per cent of employment growth, government for 30 per cent and personal services for 15.3 per cent. Manufacturing is estimated to contribute only 12 per cent of the growth for 1987, and mining and forestry only one per cent.

There is no doubt as to the general direction predicted for the Ontario economy in these in-depth reports. The economy of the next decade will be characterized by an increasingly weak manufacturing sector and dangerously top heavy and still growing service sector. This reality stands in stark contrast to the recent forecasts by the government of Ontario.

I'd like to turn to a specific portion of the budget now. One of the changes announced was an exemption from section 113 of the Mining Act for Ontario's resource corporations. That section requires companies to process their minerals here. The Treasurer is not only going to allow the companies to ship ores elsewhere for processing, but he is going to allow them to charge those refining costs against their Ontario profits. We object to such a policy because we feel it exports jobs to places such as Norway and the UK and reduces the revenues Ontario receives in the form of mining profits taxes.

We know that Falconbridge, a company that already has had an exemption, has been resident in the Sudbury area for 45 years and has never built a refinery there. Falconbridge still ships its ores to Norway for refining and further processing. Inco continues to ship a significant proportion of its ores to Wales for refining.

When our leader in his reply to the budget expressed our opposition to the Treasurer's policy changes, we did not know of the existence of a Ministry of Natural Resources report, entitled Toward a Nickel Policy for Ontario. We did not know of it because it was not released until 10 days after the budget date, even though it was completed in December, 1977. The report, by a senior Ministry of Natural Resources official, Dr. Tom Mohide, condemned the whole concept of processing exemptions and stated so very explicitly. The report recommended, among other things, that unused refining capacity here be utilized before processing exemptions were granted and the ore was shipped to other countries.

Within 10 days of his budget the Treasurer had his mineral policy shot down in flames by people more knowledgeable than himself about mineral taxation policies. As a matter of fact, during the select committee hearings on the nickel industry layoffs, both Inco and Falconbridge officials told us that taxation policies were not the solution to their problem. The problem was world-wide demand in relation to stockpiled inventories. It is hard to imagine where the Treasurer got his advice on tax policy affecting the mineral industry.

One of the criteria used by economists to determine the economic benefits of mineral exploitation is known as linkages. There are forward and backward linkages. In Ontario, we do not benefit sufficiently from either. Backward linkages relate to industry's purchasing of input. In Canada, backward linkages result in purchases from suppliers outside this country. That explains our huge deficit in mining machinery and equipment. Domestic shipments supply only 21 per cent of the Canadian mining machinery market, despite the fact that Canada ranks number three in the world in mineral production.

Forward linkages relate to processing and fabricating. In Ontario, these linkages run outside the country as well. We not only have an industry that refuses to process domestically, but we have a Treasurer who discourages it by granting processing exemptions to the entire industry.

When I was a member of the select committee on the nickel industry layoffs, I did some research and came across a 1915 report of the Ontario Royal Commission on Nickel. What a revelation it was. At that time there was public pressure for Inco to do its refining here rather than in the US. I quote from that report: "There is, first, the natural desire to have all the work on raw material which is produced here done at home, up to the point of turning out the finished article. Employment is given to Canadian workmen, Canadian chemists and Canadian experts. The rewards of this labour are spent in Canada and swell the volume of Canadian business. There is a feeling of impatience at seeing Canadians as hewers of wood and drawers of water, while in another country technical and skilled work is performed in refining an article of Canadian origin."

Mr. Warner: Old Tories never change.

Mr. Laughren: Back in those days, the industry used the same kind of arguments it uses now. When testifying before a House of Commons committee in 1910 the industry said: "Certainly nickel could be refined in Canada but not at a price which would enable it to compete with nickel produced abroad. If the industry were attempted in southern Ontario, the sulphur fumes would be considered a nuisance. An export duty on matte would close up the works at Copper Cliff, and consequently the mines also, in which case the company would bring ores or matte from their nickel lands in New Caledonia to be refined in the USA."

Little has changed in the last 65 years. It is an affront to all of us that with mineral production valued in excess of $2 billion this year, mining taxes will total less than $20 million. That is less than a one per cent return on our non-renewable resources. That kind of return is the result of allowing our resources to be exploited without a coherent industrial or mineral strategy to ensure that maximum benefits accrue to the people of Ontario.

The person responsible for taxation policy in this province is the Treasurer. He has allowed our minerals to be frittered away with no long-range planning for the resource communities when those minerals are depleted, and no guarantees we will obtain maximum benefits from those minerals while they are being depleted. There is no single area in which the differences between the government and we New Democrats is greater.

What is so worrisome about the mining industry in Ontario is that much of our prosperity has been based on the export of our minerals. It is the export of minerals which in large part has allowed us to import such a large percentage of our manufactured goods and allowed Canadians to achieve the standard of living which they presently enjoy.

It is not just the economic health of northern Ontario that is at stake. The mining industry has changed in recent years and it has become much more capital intensive as the companies streamline their operations and improve their productivity. It is appropriate, of course, that our industries should utilize the latest in technology to enable them to most efficiently extract the ore. We get into trouble when that technology is purchased elsewhere. We end up with an increased rate of ore reserves depletion and fewer jobs to accomplish it.

Between 1966 and 1974 the total number of people employed in metallic mining in Ontario declined in absolute numbers from 27,000 to 25,400, a decline of 6.4 per cent; and during the same period ores mined increased from 43 million to 62 million tons, an increase of 44.5 per cent.

It is not as though the mining industry was not profitable and was not able to contribute to Ontario revenues. On the contrary, between 1966 and 1977 the average profitability measured in net income as a percentage of sales was extremely good. Between those years the net income as a percentage of sales for total manufacturing averaged 4.2 per cent; for total industrials 4.2 per cent and for metal mines and primary metals 11.3 per cent.

The industry sometimes argues that tax breaks are necessary if there is to be continued exploration and development in the province, but the companies have been re-receiving concessions and substantial profits and have not been doing the exploration and development which is necessary to ensure we have a continuing healthy mining industry in Ontario.

In 1978, mining tax revenues will drop to about $20 million. That represents a sad but telling commentary on the mineral management policies of this government. It is not as though this government has not been warned. Experts in mining have been telling the Ministry of Natural Resources that it is wrong. The Ministry of Natural Resources document entitled Towards a Zinc Policy for the Province of Ontario said: "We have the potential to expand the province's zinc mining and refining capacity. We have the undeveloped ore in the province, but there is ore elsewhere as well."

Accordingly, the report warned: "If plants are not planned now and built here in Ontario they will likely be built elsewhere." The report suggested a number of ways the province could stimulate zinc activity, including direct provincial involvement in a custom refinery, that is a refinery that handles ore from different companies. This might provide employment for about 500 people. When it comes to mineral policy this government has decided to let the chips fall where they will. There simply is no policy. This government has taken the path of least resistance. We have had a succession of unimaginative if not downright dull-witted ministers who lack the courage to be either creative or innovative; and they hide behind their failure by insisting that the private sector knows best.

When free enterprise fails us, Mr. Speaker, the Frank Millers and the Leo Berniers and the Darcy McKeoughs of this world tell us there is no better way. To date, the government has shown no evidence that it intends to develop a mineral policy for the province. Whether we talk about zinc or nickel it is evident that our natural resources advantage is slipping away.

The government might have renegotiated the price of mining leases to make sure that the province gets its fair share for its own resources. The government has not done this. This government has simply granted mindless concessions which guarantee nothing more than the exports of jobs to some other jurisdiction.

Nothing could be a better example of the government silliness and shortsightedness in dealing with Ontario's natural resources and industrial development than uranium. For years now Ontario has returned from federal-provincial conferences in abject failure. At every conference Ontario has railed away at the cost to this province in jobs of oil and gas price increases. Despite this deliberately vocal and politically useful opposition from Ontario, oil prices in this country have moved in lock-step toward the inflated world price. Ontario's excuse has always been that we don't own the oil so we can't call the tune; the tune calling is done by Alberta and Imperial Oil.

But in the case of uranium we own the resource, a significant source of energy and one which promises to be even more important in the future. It is under our control, and in fact is public property. What did Ontario do? Did it take the opportunity to give our industry a competitive advantage to lower energy prices? Did it take the opportunity to use the wealth generated by Ontario's resources to strengthen our industrial base? Of course not; this government gave away the opportunity in the biggest single resource sellout in the province's history.

Ontario Hydro takes all the risks, puts up all the capital at no interest and guarantees the price. Rio Algom and Denison Mines simply pull in the profits, an estimated $2 billion at least over 40 years. All the while Ontario was whining in public about having no control over energy prices, it was ignoring the recommendation by Hydro itself that the uranium mines be brought into the public sector.

At the time the contracts were signed, we in the NDP argued that a controlling interest in the two companies could have been purchased for about $300 million, roughly the amount of Hydro's interest-free investment in the mines. The people of Ontario will be paying for years for this government's blind devotion to private enterprise in higher energy costs and slower economic growth.

We believe that if the resources in this province were in the public sector they could be used to help us reverse the trend of declining employment and the de-industrialization of the province. One of the present problems is that employment is declining in the resource industries because of the highly capital-intensive nature of those industries and because the machinery is being purchased elsewhere. Obviously the industry must modernize, but it would be to the advantage of all of us if this was to happen with the purchase of machinery made in this province or elsewhere in Canada.

We have never advocated the public ownership of resources for punitive reasons. We have done so because it makes good economic sense. New Democrats believe that the economic surplus generated in the resource sector should be partially directed to the building of a heritage fund, similar to those already in place in Alberta and Saskatchewan, to establish a healthy manufacturing base.

There is no better example of this potential than with mining machinery. It is ludicrous that we have a $750-million deficit on mining machinery in Ontario while our mining industry ranks number three in the world. The private sector is not going to do this because of the cosy relationship between the resource industries and the machinery manufacturers elsewhere. It surely is no coincidence that there are interlocking directorships between Inco, for example, and mining machinery companies in the United States. It is a most comfortable arrangement and perfectly legal.

We believe the revenues generated by the resource sector should be reinvested in job-producing secondary industries tied to that resource base. It is no coincidence that resource communities suffer from a lack of municipal and social services. It is no coincidence that there are very few jobs available in resource communities for our younger, well-educated people. Those resource communities have plainly and simply been used in a cavalier fashion, and we say that enough is enough.

There are people who make the claim that, by increased taxation, we can have control of the resource sector without the ownership. I do not believe that is possible, for a couple of very important reasons.

First, when taxes are increased in the resource sector the private sector simply diverts an ever-increasing amount of its investment funds to another jurisdiction. We have already seen Ontario's percentage of world nickel markets decline dramatically from 85 per cent in 1950 to approximately 35 per cent in 1978. That is at least partially because Inco and Falconbridge have made a commitment to developing their resources in the Third World.

The second major reason taxation policy can never return maximum benefits to the people of Ontario is the principle of high-grading. High-grading in the resource sector is a practice of extracting the high-quality ores while leaving the low-quality grades behind. The grade level at which an ore is economically valuable is, of course, determined by the price of the mineral. If either the price of the mineral drops or the taxation of the industry goes up, then the private sector simply raises the grade level at which it is economical to mine that particular mineral. Any jurisdiction which raises the level of taxation to a level unacceptable to the private sector simply encourages the high-grading of resources, which means they become depleted all the faster. Surely we cannot accept as a mineral policy one that encourages high-grading and the rapid depletion of a non-renewable resource, any more than we can endorse a mineral policy that returns one per cent of the value of the ores to the Ontario Treasury.

There are reasons of occupational health and safety and environmental control which also justify public ownership of resources, and when they are combined with the important role our resources can play in the development of a new and exciting industrial strategy the argument becomes compelling indeed.

I would like to turn next to our forestry industry, which is having problems, although they are different from those of the mining industry. Between 1967 and 1975, employment declined by 1.7 per cent in the industry while the value of pulp and paper sold increased by 64 per cent. The Canadian Council of Resource and Environment Ministers' task force report on forest policies in Canada had this to say about the Canadian forest industry—and of course it applies in spades to Ontario: "It is believed that a large portion of the Canadian forest industry has technologically fallen behind its international competitors and that there has been a relatively low level of reinvestment in plants."

Our situation is deteriorating rapidly. According to Mr. W. J. Johnson, vice-president of Abitibi Price in charge of woodland operations, there are currently 27 new pulp and paper processing machines on order for installation in the United States, compared with one for all of Canada. Abitibi has recognized this trend and has itself already established two mills in the southern United States. According to Doug Drysdale, director of the timber sales branch of the Ministry of Natural Resources, unless investment is made to modernize our pulp and paper mills the industry in Ontario will be in even more serious trouble.

The problem is circular. If the pulp and paper companies do not put any money into modernizing their mills, we certainly cannot expect them to care about forest management. Without investment in forest management there won't be enough wood for the mills. Forest management and mill modernization go hand in hand, and investment must be made in both if our forest industry is to survive.

The forest industry is too important in Ontario to be ignored when the Treasurer is establishing fiscal policies for the province. There are approximately 78,000 people directly employed in the forestry industry and the same number indirectly. That means 156,000 jobs are created by our forests, but there is a very real danger that the number will drop considerably unless the industry modernizes its plant and equipment, and unless the government requires such investment in return for the cutting rights for a resource that belongs to the people of Ontario.

The combination of extremely poor reforestation policies and the failure of the industry to invest in modern technology has brought us to a crossroads in the forest industry. It is incumbent upon this government to establish policies to ensure that the situation does not deteriorate further and that profits earned on our resources are ploughed back into the industry.

This, of course, will require intervention on the part of the government, which in turn requires courage. Despite the fact that these ingredients have not been evident on the part of this government, the time has come when further delay simply cannot be tolerated. The Ontario timber revenue task force in 1975 had this to say:

"The potential benefits of further processing of pulp merit examination. Pulp production is the most energy and pollution-intensive of the forest-based industry activities. It is, therefore, a high-cost activity which offers less return to the province than basic paper and paperboard production. An examination of the potential processing of pulp would be timely, given that the expansion plans of Ontario's industry are highly oriented towards pulp rather than paper production."

That same task force warned us of the dangers of our very heavy dependence on one foreign market—namely the US—

Mr. Nixon: That's it, 40 minutes.

Mr. Laughren:—and recent evidence shows the danger of relying on one market when that market deteriorates.

Our market share of newsprint sales in the US has dropped from 80 per cent in 1950 to 60 per cent today. This is primarily the result of southern US production, and if the trend continues the problems in the forest industry will be even more severe than they are today.

Recent figures showing substantial profits gains in the industry should not be simply noted and forgotten. In 1977, forest products was one of the leading sectors, with increases in sales of 92 per cent, and in Ontario the figures were even higher. For example, Abitibi's net income increased by 191 per cent; Domtar by 153 per cent and Great Lakes Paper by 194 per cent. A significant portion of this increase is the result of our devalued dollar. Great Lakes estimates that the exchange premium accounted for 57 per cent of their 1977 net earnings.

The big question is what these companies will do with these increased earnings. Ostensibly, one of the aims of wage and price controls was to get investment going in Canada again. For the pulp and paper industry this is particularly acute. Even in years of record profits the pulp and paper industry has failed to reinvest in Ontario. The average age of pulp facilities in this province is 38 years and of paper mills four years. That information comes from a report of the Ontario timber revenue task force. The result is a forest industry that has fallen behind international competitors.

It is a sad commentary that resources such as minerals and forestry have been allowed to fall behind, either in world market share or in competitiveness because of the failure of this government to develop policies to sustain a healthy industry.

I have been talking about the weakness of several sectors of the economy. I would like to turn for a moment to some of the regional economic problems and the government's failure to do anything about them.

The Ontario Economic Council recently released a paper entitled Input-output Analysis of Fiscal Policy in Ontario, which had some revealing comments to make about the Treasurer's fiscal policy.

Mr. Nixon: Are you half-way through?

Mr. Laughren: Yes.

The study indicates that Ontario's fiscal policy tends to favour the Toronto-centred region at the expense of other regions of the province. To quote the paper: "Virtually all Ontario government programs have had the effects of increasing the concentration of employment in the Toronto-centred region and of increasing regional income disparities." In other words, the government's economic policies have made the regional differences even greater.

The Treasurer seems unable to design and implement policies directly relevant to the regions that need economic development. What the Treasurer does not seem to understand is that people in the north, the east and the west of this province would much prefer to have a self-sustaining economy rather than government handouts which simply make the various regions more dependent upon Queen's Park, and when government restraint is necessary it is those very areas which are the first to feel the crunch.

When the Treasurer indicated that he had to have $78 million in order to pay for the reduced OHIP premiums, one of the first areas which he selected was the regional priorities budget of the Ministry of Northern Affairs. He did this despite the dramatic unemployment figures for northern Ontario. If we had a balanced, growing economy we would not have to be so preoccupied with either balancing the budget or with regional disparities.

A look at the unemployment levels across the province is interesting indeed. Communities with a skilled work force and a developed municipal, industrial and educational infrastructure are experiencing completely unacceptable levels of unemployment. The St. Catharines-Niagara area leads all major municipal areas with an unemployment rate of 11.7 per cent, slightly worse than Sudbury and Kitchener-Waterloo, each of which have an 11.2 per cent.

In all of Canada, according to Statistics Canada, only St. John's, Newfoundland, and Chicoutimi-Jonquiere in Quebec have higher rates. It takes more than benign indifference to preside over that kind of economic performance; it takes creative fiscal mismanagement and the Treasurer deserves the credit.

It is a sad commentary that those parts of the province which have done so much to make the province prosperous are the ones which are paying the price now in high unemployment. The Sudbury basin has been the source of enormous wealth that has benefited the entire province. The St. Catharines-Niagara area is in the heart of the best farm land, and a centre of much of the auto parts manufacturing and assembly which occurs in Ontario. Kitchener-Waterloo is a diversified community with many small businesses. For areas like these to suffer unemployment in excess of 11 per cent indicates the seriousness of the problems in our economy.

I would now like briefly, to turn to a problem that has caused great concern to the municipal leaders all across Ontario.

Mr. Nixon: Forty-five minutes.

Mr. Laughren: Two weeks ago, the Treasurer pulled the plug on assessment reform in this province. We have been waiting for almost 10 years. It has been postponed so many times and studied so many times it would be tedious to run through the list. Now he is backing away again, blaming municipalities, the media and the opposition as he goes. The reality is that it's the Treasurer's own fault. He could not get his package through the cabinet, and if his package does not go through nothing goes through.

It is not hard to see why he is doing it that way. The Treasurer knows, as we know, that there are real problems with the property assessment system; the Treasurer knows that there are real problems with assessment equalization in merged areas like Cambridge; and the Treasurer knows that there are real equity problems in the provincial equalization grant system.

The Treasurer could solve these problems tomorrow if he wanted to, but he won't. He won't do it because he needs the anger and frustration caused by those problems to build support for part of the package he insists on getting through, namely the tax reform proposals. But it's the tax reform and grants part of the proposal that are at the root of the problem.

The Treasurer has two great obsessions: uniformity and control, and balancing the budget. His obsession with uniformity and control has led to a municipal tax proposal in which all of the policy is set by Queen's Park. The municipalities merely collect the taxes. The property tax becomes a provincial tax administered by local government.

Ontario is too diverse to have a single municipal tax system applicable without variation in every municipality, and the figures bear this out. His proposal on average reduces single-family residential taxes outside Metro Toronto; it increases taxes substantially in Metro. His proposal increases taxes on business outside Metro; it reduces taxes on business in Metro. In Metro, taxes on small businesses stay roughly the same; outside Metro, they go up. The only way out of the dilemma is to give local governments some flexibility in setting their own tax policy, and that's exactly what the Treasurer won't do.

His obsession with balancing his budget at the expense of property taxpayers is just as destructive. The so-called Edmonton commitment to revenue sharing is meaningless. The province's grants for education have dropped from 61 per cent of expenditures just three years ago to 53 per cent this year.

Mr. Nixon: Just like some kind of nightmare, a sort of Catch 22.

Mr. Laughren: Many people see the Treasurer's market value assessment and tax reform package as a lever to reduce Ontario's commitment still further. The Treasurer's actions don't do much to allay these fears. In his tax reform proposal the Treasurer argued that it is fair for the province to pay taxes on the property that it owns, and then announced that the municipalities would pay the increased provincial costs through lower grants on a dollar-per-dollar basis.

The Treasurer should stop using the inequities created by the assessment and grants scheme. He should end the squeeze on equalization factors for grants and for cost apportionment in merged areas. He should change the Assessment Act to enable municipalities to deal with the growing volume of successful assessment appeals by large corporate taxpayers. Those changes can and should be made.

He should bring in an assessment reform system that deals with the potential problems created by market value. He should bring in tax reform that sets out the scope for municipal tax policy. He should stop quibbling over revenue sharing and should bring changes to the tax credit system that would have a real impact on the regressivity of property tax.

[4:15]

The Treasurer has not only failed to display courage or imagination in bringing in policies to stimulate and rebuild the Ontario economy, he has failed to take seriously any suggestions offered to him. When the leader of the NDP replied to the budget for us on March 14, he laid before the Treasurer a number of job-creation proposals which would have created over 45,000 jobs.

The fiscal year is not yet three months old, and already this year's budget lies in tatters. The assumptions on which it was based are meaningless and its meagre proposals futile. Revenue estimates for last year have dropped since then, reducing the base of this year's revenues. That weakening of the economy, together with the failure of the OHIP increase and the federally-inspired sales tax cut have added nearly $500 million to the expected deficit and shown up the Treasurer's budget balancing plan for the hollow charade that it is.

Estimates of economic growth and employment for Ontario have been revised downwards, underlining the seriousness of the government's failure to create jobs. Within a week of the budget's introduction the Ministry of Natural Resources' report was released which attacked directly the budget proposal to sell out Ontario's resources by giving tax concessions for foreign processing. The government's own study of the machinery sales tax rebate showed that it will cost Ontario 15,000 jobs in this year alone.

Property tax reform has been shelved again because of the Treasurer's blind devotion to uniformity and his stubbornness. In the debate over the future of the auto industry, Ontario is floundering, trying to resolve the conflict between the Treasurer and the Ministry of Industry and Tourism when it should be leading.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Nonsense.

Mr. Laughren: It's not nonsense. Although it is only three months since the Treasurer's budget was introduced, virtually nothing in it is valid today. The budgetary deficit predicted by the Treasurer to be $1.3 billion will be in excess of $1.6 billion. Revenues will be at least $400 million below his projections.

These revenue shortfalls should tell the Treasurer what we told him in March: that his budget is a failure. Ontario's economic problems are serious and they demand a serious response. The first priority of the NDP is to get the economy moving again and to put people back to work. In the short term we have proposed municipal projects, housing construction and other measures, to create more than 45,000 jobs. In the long run, we would provide the leadership to rebuild our manufacturing and resource sectors. The Treasurer cannot hope to balance the budget without a strong economy; he cannot hope to have a strong economy with a budget that actually makes our economic problems worse.

The Treasurer simply must bring before this Legislature a new set of budgetary policies in September or October of this year. This current budget is simply not enough as it stands. Ontario can't afford to drift aimlessly for the next nine months with a budget that is invalid, obsolete and destructive.

On motion by Hon. Mr. Timbrell, the debate was adjourned.

AUTO PACT

Hon. Mr. Timbrell moved that the House do now consider sessional paper 162, background paper on the automotive industry.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Before the debate begins, may I say it is my understanding that the House leaders have agreed this debate will conclude by 6 p.m. this evening and that the time remaining be equally divided among the three parties.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I suppose there are only three or four or five occasions when I have stood in this House and in some part of my remarks been parochial, which is the way I propose to begin this afternoon.

The former Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Nixon) will recall that one of those occasions concerned blackbirds; I think that was my maiden speech. He, as a farmer, will be interested to know that that problem seems to be on its way to being solved—

Mr. Nixon: Been going down hill ever since.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: This isn't due to any great action of government; I guess it is something in the cycle of the birds which seems to have made that less of a problem—

Mr. Nixon: They keep dumping on my county.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Well, that's a solution to the problem in any case.

But I do want to start this afternoon by saying something about the automotive pact in terms of my own riding, my own county, Chatham, and Wallaceburg in particular. I believe the background papers tabled by the Premier (Mr. Davis) this morning indicated something about the International Harvester Corporation. This is an American-owned multinational which has been in Chatham, I believe, for over 50 or 60 years, as well as in Hamilton where they have a truck plant.

Prior to the automotive pact there were about 1,000 people—800 or 900—working at International Harvester. At that time they produced part of something like 26 trucks for Canada. Since the automotive pact they have been making three trucks, basically, for the whole North American market. During that time, employment has risen from something under 1,000 to something just under 2,000.

Additionally, in my own riding, we are blessed with a number of automotive parts plants. Eaton Springs has two plants in the riding. Canadian Fram, Rockwell and a number of smaller plants as well as tool and die shops and service industries adjacent to and part of what is the largest employer, the single most important industry in this province, the automotive industry. Something like one in six jobs are directly and indirectly related in this province to the automotive industry.

It is obviously of great concern to my people and to my riding, and a great concern therefore to me, as well as being of concern to members of the Legislature and to me as a member of the government, and as Minister of Economics for the province.

The auto pact has been good for my riding; the auto pact has been good for Ontario; the auto pact has been good for Canada. Nevertheless, it became apparent two or three years ago that the auto pact perhaps was not working fully as well as it had at the beginning or as well as some of us had hoped and had reason to believe it should work.

I take some pride in the fact—and I say this completely immodestly—that the first authoritative work on the subject of the auto pact appeared in my budget of 1976 when we laid out our concerns and when we laid out some of the numbers and some of the figures. During that time, the federal government took the position that we should not rock the boat. I would say that with some shifts, but very small ones, the government of Canada is still of the view that the boat should not be rocked.

Proud as I am of the achievements of my country and those who work in this country—be they working for international firms or American firms or Canadian-owned firms—proud as I am of the achievements of those people, both from the managerial section to those at the very bottom in those plants, the men on the lines; nevertheless, I don't think rocking the boat is simply the answer to something where we have perceived there are some difficulties, and where for lack of a better term—and I certainly don't want to debate this particular issue this afternoon—in recent years we perceive we have not been getting as fair a share as we feel we are probably entitled.

I put all this in the context of the fact that the automotive pact—and we should not forget this—is a treaty—I guess that is the correct word—between the government of Canada and the government of the United States. It is something whose levers, whatever those levers are, some of which are fragile, rest with the government of Ottawa so far as Canada is concerned. There really is very little power, very little authority; very little we can do in this House, as private members or as members of the government, to influence, without giving away the store, the outcome of that pact, which is essentially an international treaty between the two sovereign countries, each in its own right exercising its own authority and its own levers of power.

The situation is complicated somewhat by the fact that we are talking about an industry which at the vehicle assembly end is not owned in this country. I think, realistically, perhaps that does have some bearing on the situation. I don't think it is a large factor. Whatever factor it is, the other side of that coin which must be recognized, of which I am aware in my riding and to which, I am sure, others in this House could also pay testimony, is the very superior performance of that part of the industry which is located in Canada, probably stemming from the fact that we started from behind. There was, in the early years of the pact, an enormous investment in Canada. Most of the plants which I have mentioned in my own riding—and this is true in Oakville; it's true in Ste. Therese; it's true at Talbotville—are up-to-date, modern buildings for the most part, with ample room to grow and expand, or contract as the case may be to make the necessary changes; with as good technology and machinery and equipment as is available in North America today.

On top of that, we have a work force, both at the salaried and the hourly-rated level, which is good, which is productive, which is efficient, which is well-represented by a Canadian union—and I stress that: the United Auto Workers, with whom I've had my differences, and will have my differences, I suppose, in the future—which has represented its workers well. By and large, the forces of capital, of technology, of labour, of management are working together, these factors, a good climate in this country and in this province, have produced an industry of which we in this House, as the representatives of the people of Ontario, can be damned proud.

I say that particularly with reference to a couple of plants in my own riding. Last spring I had lunch with the board of directors of that company, who are American. They have something like, I believe, 90 plants worldwide—60 in the United States, six in Canada. I expected I would hear about higher Canadian taxes and lower Canadian productivity, or the cost of interest in Canada versus the cost of interest in the United States. I heard none of those things.

What they told me was that those two plants—having achieved certain economies of scale, with a good work force, with the right injection of capital and technology and knowhow—were as productive, if not more productive, than any of their 90 worldwide plants.

What I am saying then—building on the basis that we do have other winners in this country, although we are talking about the automotive pact this afternoon—is that we have some industries which I think, some of us realistically feel are going to have a tough time competing in the world, but this is an industry in which we have every reason to take great pride and in which we have to take a back seat to no one, particularly in the present context to those south of the border.

You will recall—and I vividly recall—in 1976, after the budget, the third party in this province criticized that paper; that is a matter of record and that is their right. There was a monumental yawn then from the United Auto Workers, and Ottawa disputed the whole thing and refused to do anything about it.

Mr. S. Smith: Who was the third party then?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I then recall—my dates may be somewhat wrong—that there was a stirring—and I take, as I've said, a modest pride in the fact that the Ontario budget paper had something to do with it—a stirring of interest in the problems of that particularly large and vital sector of our economy.

Subsequently, the government of Canada appointed Arthur to do a report which came out in the spring of 1977. Arising from the Arthur report we have had an ongoing debate, I suppose with some intensity for the last six or eight months.

As members are well aware, and without attesting to the veracity of the figures or the breakdown of the figures, the word was spread that because of the move to more fuel-efficient cars and smaller cars, the industry over the next few years in North America would have to spend—the figure most commonly used was something like $58 billion.

I think it's important to know and to remember that is not all new employment. Many who have come in have pointed out that much of it is replacement; simply replacing old machinery, perhaps old buildings, old dies, old presses with new machinery. The increase in employment from a big chunk of that $58 billion will be very small.

Mr. Deans: There may be some decrease and net loss of employment.

[4:30]

Hon. Mr. McKeough: In fact, I suppose it could be argued that with some of the machines and equipment there may be some decrease, I think marginal, in employment. But I would doubt that it would be more than the normal growth in the industry and the number of vehicles produced. I don't think that's a large cause for worry as there is a greater productivity and a greater output per man hour, but it does make it essential, and this is what we attempted to point out; and did point out, I think rather effectively a couple of months ago in the paper, which we produced in Treasury and which we tabled and which we have sent to the various companies. We've had no formal response from Ottawa on that paper. We've had no formal response, interestingly enough—in fact no response at all from the motor vehicle manufacturers. The parts people essentially agree with it; and after sorting away a few facts and figures the United Auto Workers agree with that paper.

I'm not here to defend every figure in that paper one way or another. It was part of a contribution, and it is important to remember also that we in Ontario do not have access to all the figures. The figures are available only to the government of Canada, and I suppose the government of the United States under the automotive pact. Some of what we do and some of what we think is based on educated guesses, and sometimes they're better guesses than not.

What I would like to say I will do, in the context of a brief presented to us the other day, last Monday, by the United Auto Workers—I won't give you their answers to the questions they pose, because they can do that in their own good time and in their own language and in their own way; but Mr. White—and without equivocation I say that Mr. White presented the position of that large and powerful and strong union very well and very intelligently, and with a great deal of understanding of not only his problems and the problems of the members of his union but also I think, with a real understanding and concern for the needs of this province and the needs of this country, and I am glad to have this opportunity of putting those thoughts on the record as part of my contribution this afternoon. It was an excellent presentation and we had a very good discussion.

He posed, or the UAW had posed, three questions: First of all—this isn't in order—are we calling for negotiation of the auto pact as the only alternative? My answer to that is, of course, no. I'm not suggesting that there should be a renegotiation of the pact; I don't think there needs to be, I've never been of that view. I think, frankly, it's a red herring if people say we should renegotiate the pact. I think what we have to do is find ways to get the parties to the pact to recognize their moral if not their legal obligations under the pact.

I suppose there's a bottom line. I don't contemplate that bottom line. The bottom line is that at some point, if we weren't successful in our entreaties or our suggestions or our pounding on the table or whatever, we could go back to manufacturing our own cars in Canada, which frankly I don't think is the most realistic proposition in the world. I doubt that the Canadian people would probably pay the price to have a separate and Canadian-only automobile industry. I don't think, frankly, that's a viable alternative; but I suppose that is the ultimate, that is the bottom line. The renegotiation of the pact per se, in my view, is a non-starter.

The second question—and they asked it narrowly; I'll broaden it a bit—does the policy of the UAW not run into conflict with the interests of American workers and of the United Auto Workers in the United States; and within Canada isn't there friction between Ontario and Quebec workers over new facilities? I'll give members their answer; they said not. I would agree with that at this moment in time. I would agree with that; and there are many—who would not label themselves continentalists, who would not label themselves free traders—there are many who would say that for the continued health, prosperity, growth, economic well being and quality of life of men and women in North America, north and south of the border, we should be working towards—the phrase often used is more “mini” auto pacts in a number of areas.

I don't know enough about this, although the idea certainly has some appeal from a layman's point of view, of which I'm one in this area; but certainly unless we are to try to build a wall—heaven forbid—around either Canada or the United States, or North America collectively, then there is no question that one of the largest problems we have facing us is the low wage, and increasingly high technology competition from the Third World, from the LDCs and so on.

If we are to go on competing, and competing well without the benefit of high tariff walls or higher tariff walls, then we are going to have to be efficient; we are going to have to have the full economies of scale, and in some instances—not in all instances—that is probably going to mean achieving some of the economies and efficiencies in other areas that we have achieved over the last 10 or 12 years—witness international Harvester in Chatham—in other industries and other sectors of our economy.

I would say that what we need to do in North America is look at this problem intelligently, do our damndest to settle it intelligently for the best interests of our people north and south of the border, be it the Ottawa River or the Great Lakes. It is important to do so, not just because of the automobile industry but because I think there's some possibility that for our own good, both of us probably have to be looking at some other arrangement in other areas as well. That's the very key significance of solving this problem.

Many of us in this House—perhaps more from my part of Ontario than that part of Ontario from which the leader of the third party comes, but I see my friend from Essex is here—many of us from our part of Ontario particularly have as many friends and relatives on the other side of the Detroit River as we have on our side of the Detroit River. We know many of the people who work in automotive parts plants, in automotive plants in Detroit particularly. They're nice people. I think they've got as big a problem as we have. It's all very well for Governor Rhodes to entice people from Detroit to Lima. What does that do to Detroit? I think that's fundamentally as big a problem as enticing them from Windsor or from Niagara, to Montreal, to Lima or wherever.

I don't think this is a problem that, frankly, can be looked at from the point of view of Ontario or from the point of view of Quebec or Ohio or Pennsylvania or New York state or Michigan. I'm not interested—and I think my friend from Hamilton Wentworth (Mr. Deans) nodded when I said there may not be that much growth and then what we're trying to do is hold our own—I'm no more interested in seeing people having to move, or going out of work in St. Catharines and moving to Valleyfield, than I am in seeing people having to move or going out of work in Detroit because something new is opening up in Lima. I can't honestly believe that it is in the best interest of the companies themselves—Canadian or American or international: I can't honestly believe that it is in the best interests of the governments of Canada or the United States, or Michigan or Ohio, Ontario or Quebec, to get into that kind of a game and say: "Because we can do a little better here than we can there, let's open here and leave it a bit"; and that, "This one's in danger over here," and then hope that people will move backwards and forwards.

I simply can't believe—I refuse to believe—that that makes some sort of sense in a North American, let alone in a Canadian, context. I'm not interested, and I say this, I'm no more interested in seeing a new General Motors plant in Chatham or Woodstock if there is some danger of taking some jobs away from St. Catharines. I'm not interested in that at all, and I certainly wouldn't be interested if it's going to cost something from the public purse.

The final question the United Auto Workers asked, and to which I address myself: does our policy not require us to support corporate incentives in order to respond to the pressures of particular groups of workers who see this as the only way to some jobs? The UAW can speak for themselves, and did and will. My position has been laid out. There was some suggestion here that there is some difference of opinion between the Minister of Industry and Tourism (Mr. Rhodes) and myself. Sure there is.

Mr. Laughren: Is he speaking this afternoon?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Difference of opinion is honest. His job is to promote industry, often in a sectoral sense; I have to worry about the economy as a whole. There hasn't been a difference of opinion. We both said from the beginning when it comes down to the crunch, and that is what was said this morning, if all else fails—

Mr. Deans: You won't.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —if Canada is not prepared to assume its obligation, knowing that Canada and Canada alone has the levers, then I am not going to sit by and watch our industry go down the drain. On that score, the Minister of Industry and Tourism, myself, the Premier, these benches, are of one mind; make no mistake about that.

Mr. Laughren: You didn't provide the leadership because of that, Darcy.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Having said that, have no doubt of the fact that I have been quoted as saying that on a scale of one to 100, giving money to Ford, General Motors or Chrysler ranks about 99th on my list of priorities.

Mr. Cassidy: And yet you are doing it.

Mr. Breaugh: Make it 101, it will have more impact.

Mr. Deans: What happened to the other 98?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: My list of priorities, if we are going to do things in this country, would include energy projects, would include Ontario Hydro; would include perhaps assisting the steel industry, for example, I would rank it as a Canadian industry, and as a basic industry, ahead of the automobile industry. So let me make no pretence that this would be high on my priority list.

Let me make this clear: we are not talking about a matter of regional development, for which I have some responsibility. If it were a question, and let's make that clear, of spending some money to get Ford or Chrysler or anybody else to establish a plant in Arvida, or Shawinigan, or Sudbury, or Kenora, it would be an entirely different debate. What we are talking about is Valleyfield; Detroit, Michigan; St. Catharines; St. Thomas; Windsor; Lima, Ohio.

Members opposite have pointed out that one of the highest rates of unemployment in this province at this moment in time, today, is in the Niagara Peninsula. If we are talking about regional development, if we are talking about what the Department of Regional Economic Expansion should be doing, then we would be looking at the Peninsula among other places.

Mr. Laughren: Oh come on, pass the buck again, Darcy.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: But we would not be looking at Montreal any more than we would be looking at Toronto, or even Oakville.

Mr. di Santo: You are responsible for the economy of the province.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: We just will not contemplate those sort of things.

Mr. Cassidy: But you're doing it, you're making the offer.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: That is not because we are talking about Montreal; we are talking about—and I support Michelin going to Nova Scotia and I would support that again; as a Canadian, those are things we should be doing. I think I have some sympathy for the Americans trying to get industry into North and South Carolina, but I really have not supported and will not support public subsidies to try to put more employment in the middle of Metropolitan Toronto or next door to Metropolitan Montreal. I just don't think that is what regional development as I have understood it over the years, is all about.

Mr. Laughren: You had better listen to the economic council.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I think that is something that needs to be put on the record.

Mr. Cassidy: Better see what your leader was saying today.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I want to mention just two or three other points, Mr. Speaker, and then I will wind up.

Mr. Laughren: Leave some time for the Minister of Industry and Tourism to speak.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Make no mistake, we as a cabinet agonized over this; we agonized long. We have not accepted the figure of $75 million. That would have to have been looked at much more closely, obviously. Nor could we accept as a cabinet that we were saying we would do something for Ford, but General Motors, Chrysler and the whole parts industry, and Harvester and American Motors could wait until some sort of a policy was developed.

That was the reason for the Telex which went out on Wednesday to Mr. Horner, prudently putting a limit on it and saying: "If you want to go ahead with your three to one scheme, okay. Reluctantly, we come in. We will not only come in for the specific Ford case, but if there are other investments which you think are critical and which we think are critical we will come in on the same basis, three for one, up to a maximum of $75 million."

[4:45]

I am told that today in the House—I haven't seen this and perhaps I shouldn't be saying it—Mr. Horner said the 75-25 split, for anything more than on the $30 million, was not a factor. That is not my recollection of the situation. People in the media have spent the better part of a month and a half trying to find out what my version of a meeting between Mr. Parizeau and Mr. Chretien, at which I was present, was all about. I am not going to get into that one.

But I will put the facts on the record whenever I am asked about how Mr. Horner has flip-flopped on this issue, and so has the government of Canada in the last three days.

Mr. Laughren: Those former Tories are the worst.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: It is incredible, simply incredible, what they have done to turn things around—for what reason, I honestly don't know.

Mr. Cassidy: So have you.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: No, we have not.

Mr. Cassidy: I have the quotes here; you are doing what you vehemently opposed.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: There is no way we have flip-flopped.

Mr. Laughren: You tried to.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: You know, the members opposite sit over there and they pontificate continually. They gyrate; we dominate. We dominate this debate on behalf of the people of Ontario, and my friend shouldn't forget it. We know exactly what we are doing in this.

Mr. Mackenzie: That says a heck of a lot for you.

Mr. Foulds: You are selling out and you know it.

Mr. Mackenzie: God help us if you know exactly what you're doing.

Mr. Deans: Actually, Darcy, when you get to this level, you nauseate.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: We have been at this for two and a half years. We have played our cards. We know what we are talking about. We are interested in employment. We are interested in the taxpayers' dollars.

Mr. Mackenzie: How come you have made such a mess of it, if you knew what you were doing?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I have never understood the NDP position. I never knew what the Grit position was until the Leader of the Opposition walked outside the House and, two minutes later, said "Give them $37.5 million." If that's his idea of how he thinks this province should be governed, he couldn't be more completely wrong. I say to the Leader of the Opposition, who wanted this debate this afternoon—

Mr. Foulds: No, he didn't. The New Democratic Party wanted this debate.

Hon. Mr. McKeough:—for once in his life, keep cool, just keep cool; don't go out here and say, "Let's spend another $18 million."

Mr. S. Smith: You keep your cool, Darcy.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Does the Leader of the Opposition deny that's what he said to the press? You know, I say to the Minister of Health (Mr. Timbrell) and to my other colleagues. I know the Leader of the Opposition is embarrassed about Jack Horner, but he really went overboard today to look after his Grit friends in Ottawa.

Mr. S. Smith: Take your time.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: They back down, they switch around, and the Leader of the Opposition says Ontario should put up another $18.5 million. I think that's going to make great reading.

Mr. S. Smith: It certainly will.

Mr. Laughren: All noise.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The Leader of the Opposition and Jack Horner can go to bed tonight with the great satisfaction that they are of one and the same mind; and boy, that is a cross my friend is going to carry for a long, long time. It is all his.

Mr. S. Smith: We'll soon see about that, Darcy. Keep cool.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The Jack Horner of the Ontario Legislature—the Leader of the Opposition should be really proud of himself.

Mr. S. Smith: You and John Rhodes still haven't got the same position.

Interjections.

Mr. Speaker: Could we have some order now, please?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Flip-Flop has really outdone himself today.

Mr. S. Smith: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we have a very important matter in front of us, a matter which was presented to this Legislature rather hastily by the Minister of Industry and Tourism, whose viewpoint was expressed almost diametrically opposite to that which we have just heard from the Treasurer.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Not so and you know it.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That's not true.

Mr. S. Smith: The Treasurer regards giving money to these large automobile companies to locate in what are obviously not DREE-identified areas—and I agree with him; I can't imagine why the area around Montreal should be identified as DREE, when St. Catharines and other places are not—as being very low—99th, I think he said—on his list of priorities.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: You are number 100, just so you know.

Mr. S. Smith: It's a lot higher on the Ministry of Industry and Tourism's list of priorities, because he said to us very plainly today that they have decided some Ontario participation in automotive investment incentive schemes was necessary, particularly in view of the importance and timing of the investment programs.

He also said to us that he was afraid that since the Ontario government was willing to offer $18.5 million, or $17.5 million, and the government of Canada has demanded $35 million, or $37 million, that we are now going to lose the Ford plant. He says on the bottom of page four of his statement: "I am very much afraid that the Ford plant will now be lost." I believe him. I presume he rose in this House to speak the truth. I feel, therefore, that I want to make certain remarks regarding this situation.

We have a real dilemma in front of us, first of all a dilemma in understanding the statement made by the minister. He refers early in his statement to the fact that an attempt is being made to attract a GM plant to Quebec with approximately $80 million, $60 million of which is being put up by the federal government. He points out that that is on a 75-25 per cent basis. I guess his feeling, which I must say I share, is that if such an agreement can be made to attract an automobile plant to an area around Montreal, then surely the very same type of agreement could be formulated to attract such a plant from another automobile company to an area of high unemployment in the province of Ontario.

I would like to point out that the history of this whole matter of the Ford plant—and let's stick to that for the moment—is, as pointed out on page one, that when the 75-25 per cent proposal was made for a $30-million incentive, the government of Ontario could not come to an agreement among itself. It could not reach agreement, and consequently had a period of indecision. During that time, for some reason—and I can't imagine what the objection is—apparently Ottawa went ahead and made an offer of $30 million to Ford entirely with federal money.

That was an interesting thing to have done. I don't understand it, but apparently that was done, because on page three of the minister's statement he points out that the Canadian incentive offer might be increased from $30 million to $75 million. So, I presume that Canada offered $30 million.

I don't think the government is objecting to that, but again I may be unclear about that.

In any event, we then go on in the minister's statement and we find that some position was taken, very different from what the Treasurer has just outlined, for a so-called non-DREE designated program for areas not designated by the DREE program. This would provide assistance, according to the Minister of Industry and Tourism, amounting to one third or one half of that available under DREE. We are not told what the basis of that is. It said that the federal official suggested the provincial participation might follow the 75-25 formula proposed in the Ford offer.

Now we have the key statement. On the bottom of page two of his statement, the minister says: "Some Ontario participation was necessary. Our principal concern, however, was related not to competing with Ohio, Michigan or New York, but with our sister provinces." They didn't want to get into some kind of bidding war with other provinces. I can't imagine what the minister is talking about. Perhaps he will explain it at some point. Surely if he is talking about a non-DREE program of 75-25, that would have been of uniform type across the country. The redefinition of a DREE area is certainly something which should be undertaken, but that's not referred to here. I don't understand that in the statement.

The minister is not in the House and neither is the Treasurer. For the record, let it be shown that on this occasion there is precisely one minister in the House, accompanied by two backbenchers from the government. That is the total turnout from the government side.

Mr. Mancini: One for every $10 million.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: The Liberals just equal the rest.

Mr. S. Smith: The statement points out they were then told by the federal government that the Ford company said that if the Canadian incentive offered could be increased from $30 million to $75 million, the facility might come to Ontario. The ante was increased at that point. At that point, despite the protestations of the Treasurer, the Ontario cabinet sent to the federal government the telegram referred to, in which Ontario offered to participate on a 25 per cent provincial, 75 per cent federal basis to get the $75 million. The Treasurer has now stated in this House that he is not sure of the $75-million figure. It's right in the Telex they sent to the federal government, so somebody must have been sure of it or he wouldn't have put it in the message.

At that point it seems the federal government, for some reason I cannot fathom, decided that only a 50-50 contribution plan would be acceptable as far as determining the origin of the incentive to draw the Ford company into this country and into Ontario. I see that the government has decided that they cannot go along with this. They could go as far as the 25 per cent in giving money to the very wealthy Ford Company, but they would not go as far as the 50 per cent.

Somehow, it's reminiscent of the story of George Bernard Shaw who was talking to a famous Lady Somebody-or-other. At dinner he said: "Tell me, would you consider going to bed with me for a million pounds?" She said: "For a million pounds I just might." Then he said: "Would you consider doing that with me for one pound?" She said: "What do you think I am, a prostitute?" He said: "That's already been determined. All we're arguing about is the price."

Let the Treasurer not come in here and pontificate to us. Let him not come in here and say that he doesn't want to give money to the auto companies, something he has 99th or 100th on his list of priorities. His government has offered 25 per cent of the $75 million incentive, but has balked at going to 50 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: It was 25 per cent of the federal offer.

Mr. S. Smith: I will read, for the benefit of the Minister of Housing, who has difficulty with that activity—

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Please don't read it to me. I think I have things in hand as well as you do.

Mr. S. Smith: I'm quoting from the government's statement: "Ontario will participate with the federal government on a 25 per cent provincial, 75 per cent federal basis in an investment incentive offer of $75 million to the Ford Motor Company." Read it.

Mr. Ruston: It's far more than a condominium in Toronto.

Mr. S. Smith: It's obvious now why the minister who has just spoken is no longer Minister of Industry and Tourism; the numbers are too much for him.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: You need not worry, you will never be in that position.

Mr. S. Smith: The government of Ontario has already agreed that it would be willing to have the 25 per cent contribution from the province to entice the Ford company here but they balk at 50 per cent.

Frankly, I can understand why they're upset. It's not right that Quebec ought to be able to attract automobile plants and the federal government go in on a 75/25 per cent basis, whereas Ontario was told that all we can have is a 50/50 basis. I can appreciate the feeling of the government about this. But if the minister is telling the truth when he says that this plant is about to make a location decision in the United States, if he's telling the truth when he says: "I am very much afraid that the Ford plant will now be lost"; I do not understand why the government has chosen to allow this Ford plant—$500 million and 2,000 jobs—to be located in the United States if that is what it truly believes will happen, merely because they are angry with the federal government for giving Quebec a better deal than Ontario. It's most regrettable that the federal government has done that. I will condemn that in the strongest terms and I don't have to take any second rank seat to the Treasurer in this regard.

Mr. Cassidy: Then you will go under.

Mr. Foulds: It will be just like you; you'll cry rape when you are being ravished.

Mr. S. Smith: If you don't like the government in Ottawa, you can certainly vote against them if you wish. The people will have that particular option very shortly, I suggest. But I'll tell you this, they are in power at the moment whether we like it or not, and to cut off our nose to spite our face would have to be about the dumbest possible thing to do at this time. We need a $500 million plant.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: They made the offer and we responded.

Mr. S. Smith: We need 2,600 jobs in this province. We've already decided to go down this rather slippery slope, a dangerous one indeed, of giving money to these companies; as much as it's a regrettable thing to be held up to ransom like that we've decided to do it.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: At least we agree on that.

Mr. Smith: Why stop at $17.5 million when for another $17.5 million or so we can get the $500 million plant on Ontario soil and create the 2,600 jobs?

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Your federal friends made the deal and we responded.

Mr. S. Smith: I'm proud to say that's the policy of the Ontario Liberal Party.

Mr. Foulds: When in doubt chicken out, that's the policy of the Liberal Party.

Mr. S. Smith: I wonder, sometimes, if the government really wants this plant here. I wonder, sometimes, if the government might not have some preference for seeing us lose the plant so they can go around the province this summer and say: "Look how dreadful it is that Quebec is always the spoiled child in confederation. Look how dreadful it is that they're getting the—"

Mr. Foulds: The Liberal policy by definition is a contradiction in terms.

Mr. S. Smith: "—La Prade heavy water plant." Wouldn't that be a nice runup towards an election on an issue where one can recollect certain language issues which arose in this House not long ago?

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, no.

Mr. S. Smith: If you want the plant, it's obvious how to get the plant.

[5:00]

I want to read into the record a letter that I have sent to the Right Honourable Pierre Trudeau dated today: "My Dear Prime Minister"—

Mr. Foulds: That ought to do it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: My dear cousin.

Mr. S. Smith: "The Ontario Minister of Industry and Tourism, Honourable John Rhodes, today reported to the Legislature certain negotiations which have been going on concerning the location of a new $500 million plant of the Ford Motor Company. It is his contention that since the Ford company was offered some considerable incentive financing to locate in the United States, the Canadian government has recommended that an incentive be offered to have the plant located in this country.

"We have been told that the Ford Motor Company originally wanted $30 million and that the government of Canada expressed a willingness to pay three-quarters of that cost provided the government of Ontario paid one-quarter. Mr. Rhodes went on to say that while the government of Ontario was still deciding how to respond to this offer, the federal government assured Ford that the $30 million incentive would be available. We are told, however, that Ford responded somewhat later by saying that $75 million would now be the necessary level of incentive.

"Mr. Rhodes reports that the government of Canada then rescinded its original offer to pay three-quarters of an incentive and that it insisted that the government of Ontario pay approximately 50 per cent of the necessary incentive to attract the Ford plant. I regret to have to tell you that this change in federal policy is very disturbing to the official opposition in the Ontario Legislature. The economy of Ontario and of Canada is heavily dependent upon a healthy and modernized automobile industry and it is clear that we are in great need of this half-billion-dollar facility, which would create 2,600 jobs.

"Furthermore, the fact that incentive arrangements have been offered by the federal government for a General Motors plant to locate in Quebec is being well publicized in Ontario and it is felt only fair that the same terms of assistance be made available in this province, where, even in many areas of southern Ontario, unemployment is at least as high as it is in the province of Quebec, and I may say particularly in the area around Montreal."

Mr. Cassidy: There goes regional development.

Mr. S. Smith: "In the interest of economic development and of national unity therefore, I strongly recommend that the federal government maintain the terms of its original offer to Ontario, namely a three to one sharing formula with the provincial government."

Mr. Foulds: Why wouldn't you do anything to save the jobs in Sudbury?

Mr. Cassidy: You wouldn't come up with a nickel to help the workers at Inco.

Mr. S. Smith: "May I add that we are all quite dismayed that it has become necessary to enter a 'bidding war' to obtain what is, after all, only our fair share of new capital investment by the large auto maker. It is evident that we are now paying a penalty for having permitted our auto industry to be totally continental in outlook and American in control. I would hope that every political means possible would be used to persuade the auto industry to put a fair share of capital investment into Canada based on sales volume in this country and based on a proper sense of responsibility as corporate citizens. You may note that I have urged the government of Ontario to accept your offer of a 50-50 split in the incentive to Ford. This is not because I agree with it—"

Mr. Cassidy: Well, why did you offer it?

Mr. S. Smith: "—but simply because I am fearful that the Ford Motor Company would otherwise imminently decide to locate this vital plant in Ohio or Pennsylvania. I am convinced, however, that the federal government should by rights go back to its original position of a three-to-one split and I would ask you to give serious consideration to this request. Best wishes. Yours sincerely, Stuart Smith."

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Love and kisses, your cousin Stuart.

Mr. S. Smith: I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that what we are faced with in this House is a situation where we have an opportunity for 2,600 jobs and a half a billion dollar plant. Regrettably, things in the auto industry are in a situation where the auto makers are demanding what amounts to blackmail and to ransom, but it seems that the government has already assured them, has already assured the auto makers—

Mr. Cassidy: And you offer to pay.

Mr. Foulds: You offer to pay.

Mr. S. Smith: —that it is prepared to go as far as $30 million from the federal government, that it is prepared to go, from the provincial government as far as a quarter of $75 million; these governments are now haggling over the remaining $17½ million or $18 million. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that for a $500 million plant, for 2,600 jobs—

Mr. Foulds: I think you should have gone and played a little tennis, Stuart. Those old flip-flop days are back.

Mr. S. Smith: —by rights we should be treated as fairly as Quebec. I, personally, deplore in the strongest terms the fact that we are not being given equal and favourable treatment. If the Ford company is going to make a decision to put the plant elsewhere and we are to lose 2,600 jobs because of this political wrangling that's going on at the moment, that would be a tragedy for the working people—

Mr. Foulds: The old flip-flop, no-principle days are back again.

Mr. S. Smith: —it would be a tragedy for our economy, it would be tragedy for the future possibility of providing employment for the young people of this province. The proper thing to do right now is to continue fighting with the federal government, but to make certain we get that plant in Ontario, to ensure that whatever money is necessary for that will regrettably have to be provided, given the realities of today's circumstances, much as I dislike and deplore these realities.

Mr. Warner: Are you related to Henry Ford?

Mr. S. Smith: The political wrangling can go on after we have made sure that plant is located in this province. I do not accept that simple statement in the minister's statement, "I am very much afraid that the Ford plant will now be lost." That's too great a sacrifice to make at this point. The realities, unfortunate as they may be, are nonetheless realities. Politics should be put aside and we should be certain to get that point into Ontario.

Mr. Cassidy: We have had an extraordinary afternoon already. We have had a flip-flop by the Treasurer and the government. We have evidence of a flip-flop by the federal Ministry of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. S. Smith: And now we are being treated to a flop.

Mr. Cassidy: We have the Liberal Party abandoning every principle it has ever had.

Mr. Kerrio: We have a plain ordinary flop from the leader of the third party.

Mr. Cassidy: The New Democratic Party has been concerned about our not getting our fair share under the auto free trade agreement for a very long time. Today's announcement, both by the Premier and by the Minister of Industry and Tourism, simply confirmed what we feared all along.

Mr. S. Smith: Read Hansard of March 3.

Mr. Cassidy: The strategy adopted both by Queen's Park and by the federal government in Ottawa in relation to the automotive industry is bankrupt and is not working.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Why don't you get some new lines. We have heard the same from you for so long.

Mr. Cassidy: The Minister of Housing is concerned about what has been done in cabinet; so are we. The evidence is that the Ontario government itself doesn't really know what policies this province should be adopting with regard to future investment and production in the automotive industry. I want to talk about that as well as about the jobs at Ford.

Even though the auto industry is the most important industry in the province, and even though auto-related activities count for one job in every six in Ontario, there was barely a peep out of this government for years after the auto pact was signed back in the mid-1960s. There was barely a peep about the state of the industry, its future, its prospects or its contribution to the strength of the industrial economy of this province.

Finally, just two years ago, the Treasurer introduced some analysis about the auto agreement in the budget. But there was no follow-up even then. Only in recent months, prompted by pressure from the New Democratic Party—

Hon. Mr. Bennett: That will be the day.

Hon. B. Stephenson: Absolutely balderdash.

Mr. Cassidy:—and prompted by pressure from the automobile workers, have the Premier, the Treasurer and the Minister of Industry and Tourism begun to take a close and serious interest in this industry.

Mr. S. Smith: Read Hansard of March 3.

Mr. Cassidy: As New Democrats, we accept some of the analysis and findings which the government has come up with. We welcome the study by the Treasurer, which was tabled at our instigation and which showed that if Canada had had a fair share of investment, of research and development and of production, that two years ago we would have had 25,000 more jobs, $866 million more in investment and an additional $200 million in research and development here in Canada.

Mr. Kerrio: We'd have to go on a spending spree. We wouldn't know what to do with the money. The NDPers would, though.

Mr. Cassidy: That's what we are losing because of this country's failure to get a fair share under the auto free trade agreement.

For a time it looked as though the government was making a commitment to the fair share concept and against the corporate incentives which the automobile companies had been pressing for with such vigour, both here and up in Ottawa. In fact, as recently as April the Treasurer made a speech down in Chatham in which he said: "Frankly, we in Ontario are against getting into fruitless, wasteful and unnecessary bidding wars of special subsidies and tax incentives. Moreover, it would undermine the spirit of our agreement with the United States." The Treasurer has said as much again today, but then he has gone along to endorse the position of his government, which is to give the incentives to which he says he is adamantly opposed and disinterested.

The fact is that we face a grave situation for the future. If current trends continue, our auto trade deficit will climb to $2.5 billion in 1985 from the current level of just over $1 billion a year.

Mr. Kerrio: What are you going to do about this plant?

Mr. Cassidy: In the parts industry, we are now suffering a $3-billion deficit every year, and that is having an enormous negative impact both on jobs and on our economy.

As the background paper that was published today indicates, if we are denied a fair share of the $60 billion of new investment which is now anticipated in the industry over the next seven years, Canada—and that means mainly Ontario if we talk about the auto industry—will be shut right out of the next generation of energy-saving aluminum and plastic-based vehicles.

Because of our declining share of investment in the 1970s, we have already been left behind; there is no time to lose if we are to catch up.

By the Premier's own reckoning, Mr. Speaker, if you take the figures he has given in the House today, in a three-year period from 1977 to 1979 we have commitments for only $100 million from GM, $250 million from Ford and $10 million from Harvester; that is a total of $360 million. Our fair share of the $60 billion investment over the next eight years would be about $6 billion over seven years, or close to $900 million a year. We have commitments for $120 million a year, which is more than $700 million short of what we should be seeing in investment in this vital industry to Ontario's future.

We have been concerned about the way the government has been handling the situation. This province has failed to use its potential influence to make sure we get a fair share of production and jobs and investment. Today we have learned that on the most fundamental question of all, whether we try to buy jobs or whether we try to get them on a fair-share basis, the Ontario government has capitulated, as has the Liberal Party, and has abandoned the position which was so firmly being taken by the Treasurer just two months ago.

Mr. Kerrio: Tell us what you are going to do, Mike.

Mr. Cassidy: Yes I will, as a matter of fact. If I can put it another way, the position up until a month ago was that—

Mr. Kerrio: What are you going to do, nationalize General Motors?

Mr. Cassidy:—Ontario was not prepared to enter the bidding game but that the Ontario government was not going to press very hard to do anything else. We got into the poker game during the past month and we got suckered by the Ford Motor Company and the other companies in the Big Four.

Mr. Laughren: Shameful.

Mr. Cassidy: Two weeks ago, despite what was being said in public, the province indicated privately that Ontario would participate in the federal incentive program. There was no indication that Ontario try to suggest any alternative approaches. Just this week, at the time the UAW was talking to the cabinet and saying they supported the government's opposition to the bidding game, in fact Ontario was in the bidding game with both feet. It seems as though they thought they had won; in fact the new investments were busily going out the window.

That is precisely the behaviour we can expect from multinationals every time we try to make these kinds of financial offers and try to buy jobs. When I asked the Premier today if Ontario had prepared an analysis of the Ford company's incredible contention that it needed $75 million to justify locating its new engine plant expansion in Ontario, he failed to indicate just what information Ontario had, or whether we had any information at all. This party does not accept that after the devaluation of the Canadian dollar and after the findings of the auditor's report the figures that Ford has put are real at all.

We know the tendency for the government to be too easily persuaded by the words of their friends in the business community without subjecting every claim to the closest and harshest of scrutiny. We do, however recognize that when Ford increased its request to $75 million that was the straw that broke the camel's back. Jack Horner could not go quite that far because it would have made our regional expansion incentives in Canada ridiculously ineffective. Ontario finally drew the line when it was asked to participate in incentives on a one-for-one basis rather than on a one-for-three basis.

As for the future of the Ford plant, today's announcement may itself be another play in the game; we will have to see. What we do know is that the incentive now being offered means that we are trying to buy jobs at the rate of $28,500 per job for the most profitable and one of the largest industries on the North American continent. We in the NDP, of course, count on Ford to locate that plant in this province, not because of financial incentives but because that is the company's moral obligation under the automotive free trade agreement.

The essence of what has been announced today, however, is this: Ontario has published a background paper with valid analysis that its intention is to justify giving investment incentives. In the paper Ontario says the current potential inequities under the auto pact must be addressed and that we must constantly remind the leaders of the auto industry in North America of our determination to have those inequities corrected. Alas, Ontario has made no specific steps to ensure that will happen, beyond the offering of incentives.

Secondly, we are now firmly embarked on a route of investment incentives through the largest and most profitable corporations in North America and already the signs are very clear of how disastrous that policy will be. Within a week of Ontario indicating what it would do, General Motors came along and pulled back on its commitment to go into Quebec because it heard that federal funds might be available. Now it's reconsidering its position completely and doesn't even know whether that investment will go into Canada at all. That's a clear indication of what's going to happen every time a major automotive investment is contemplated in the years to come.

Once the auto companies know that money is available to them from this government or from Ottawa, they're going to come here with their begging bowls in hand and there will be no alternative but to fill up their cups at the expense of the ordinary taxpayers of this province and of this country.

We are opening ourselves up, not just to the auto industry but to every major industry, to having companies which will decide to come into Canada first or decide to come into Ontario and then, having made their decision, come up here to see by how much we will sweeten the pot.

Mr. Swart: Who governs Ontario?

Mr. Cassidy: That's right. Who governs Ontario?

The Arthur report indicated our productivity is high. The Arthur report indicated that the cost of investment in this province is about the same as in the United States. The Treasurer himself has indicated that our corporate tax package is a lot more attractive—for reasons we happen to have some misgivings about—than in the competing states in the United States. Yet we make these offers.

If this happens in the automobile industry, which is one of the most productive and efficient in our country and a mainstay in our economic growth, I predict this will happen as well in other major industries which also have absolutely no reason to apply for corporate welfare.

Should our steel industry get this kind of investment incentive? We say no. Should our machinery industry get this kind of corporate incentive? We say no. Our plastics industry? We say no. We've surely had enough of these incentives under this government already. Surely we don't need any more.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: If you're so smart, go ahead and spell them out.

Mr. Cassidy: Surely the time has come to draw the line and make industry live up to its corporate responsibility.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Why don't you tell the House what you'd do about job creation?

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Mackenzie: Mr. Speaker, control the donkey over there.

Mr. Cassidy: The minister had to leave the Ministry of Industry and Tourism, because he was so incompetent in that job.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: I didn't leave it. I volunteered to go into Housing to try to improve it.

Mr. Cassidy: The Liberal policy is to give these handouts. The former Minister of Industry and Tourism's policy is to give these handouts.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: You are wrong again, Michael.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cassidy: The Treasurer says the handouts being offered by the federal government and by Ontario are a key to industrial policy in general. In fact, they're a key to the sell-out of every taxpayer in the province.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Your party should know. You'd nationalize them.

Mr. Cassidy: I want to point out that the workers who are most directly affected by this, the United Automobile Workers of America, who were here talking to the cabinet on Monday—and these are the people whose jobs are on the line—said specifically: "We are opposed to corporate incentives as a general policy for essentially two reasons: one, because it transfers income to those who are rich from those who are poor"—in other words, it's unequal and unfair—"and two, because every experience everywhere in the world shows that this kind of bidding for plants will not work."

The auto workers know the experience in Windsor, where Chrysler was forgiven $17.5 million in import duties in order to build a new truck plant just two and a half years ago. And what do we get? Two years later we get a truck plant shutting down and going to the United States. That's the success of the kind of corporate bidding which is going on right now.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: The success of the auto industry has added substantially to the economy of this province, and you've taken advantage of it every time.

Mr. Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cassidy: It's not as though we don't have any clout here in Ontario. We have clout in this province and we should use it.

Mr. Swart: You'd give them the key to the Treasury, Bennett.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: You fellows would take the key and rob it.

Mr. Cassidy: Canada purchases 1.3 million cars and trucks every year. Four fifths of those vehicles are North American. Three quarters of those vehicles bought are imported from the United States. Canada, especially Ontario, is one of the richest and most profitable for automobiles, outside the United States, in the entire world. That is the prize to which the Big Four and their subsidiaries now are being given not only generous access but also are being offered further corporate welfare handouts.

We in this party also believe in getting jobs in this province. That's why we believe the auto industry must be given priority as part of an industrial strategy for Ontario and that we must get a fair share of the jobs, the production, the investment and the research. You can't do what the Treasurer does and blame Ottawa alone. Ontario must share the responsibility. Ontario has to provide leadership in seeing that we achieve that fair share.

There are a number of specific proposals I would like to propose today. First, we should make it absolutely clear that we are opposed to the bidding game of incentives which is allowing automobile companies like Ford to blackmail this province. That approach is bound to be self-defeating and must be rejected.

Second, Ontario should take on a role of leadership in ensuring that the automobile companies live up to the spirit of the auto pact and of the commitments they entered into when the pact was originally signed. The auto pact has given the Big Four and the subsidiaries enormous advantages in growth and profits. Canada deserves to get its fair share. We should seek new commitments from the companies which would update the spirit of the original free trade agreement of 13 years ago.

Third, Congress has been monitoring performance under the auto pact for the past 13 years to look after American interests. We should be doing that in this country in order to look after Ontario and Canadian interests.

Mr. Nixon: They have been finding it so bad they want to pull out.

Mr. Cassidy: Fourth, we should be protecting the jobs in the industry now. We should be protecting workers against the layoffs that the companies are imposing on them. We should protect workers whose incomes are affected by the layoffs, as we did originally with the transitional adjustment provisions under the automobile free trade agreement.

Mr. Ashe: Would you throw out the auto pact?

Mr. Cassidy: We should take the lead in getting all jurisdictions out of the competitive bidding game. This is important. Specifically, Ontario should press the federal government to file grievances under the auto pact against the incentives now being offered by US states to lure investment away that should be going here.

Mr. Kerrio: Take them to court and I'll believe you.

Mr. Cassidy: The Americans told Ed Broadbent when he was down in the United States just two weeks ago that if we offer incentives, they will have no hesitation in filing grievances against Canada. We should do that when they offer incentives that are undermining the spirit of the auto pact.

Six, Ontario should also take a lead in bringing the automobile-producing states and provinces together in a joint effort to restore some reason to a situation of competitive incentives which could bankrupt all of us. It could bankrupt the jurisdictions involved. It will bankrupt our taxpayers and the taxpayers of the American states which are involved. The only winners are going to be the big four automobile companies that are making the rounds.

Finally, we have legislative clout as well and we should be prepared to use it.

Mr. Mancini: Sure, close them down, nationalize them.

Mr. Cassidy: I want to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that we now have the largest single industry in this province, in this continent, which is turning out cars with dramatically increased fuel economy and with a dramatic change in the size, nature and engineering of those cars, because of legislative decisions that have been made by legislators in the United States and which have been followed by federal legislators here in Canada. If that change is possible in the industry, then we too can and should use our legislative clout in conjunction with the federal government.

There are areas, such as research and development, where we can insist that that be carried out here in this province or in this country; as well as marketing, sourcing, where they get their people and where they do their business; there are a number of ways and areas in which we can and should explore using legislative powers where necessary in order to ensure that the basic concept is met, which is that we get a fair share of production, of investment and of jobs in the automobile industry here in Ontario and in Canada.

The problem we are facing with old party governments, whether we're talking about Tories and Liberals in Ontario or talking about Liberals and Tories up in Ottawa, is that they do not know how to come to grips with the basic problems of the economy as a whole.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That is absolute stupidity, really.

Mr. Cassidy: If they can't cope with the economy as a whole, they cannot cope with the automobile industry, which is one of the major areas.

Hon. B. Stephenson: You know nothing about it.

Mr. Cassidy: We in this party are committed to use every means possible to ensure we get the fair share for Canada and for Ontario, and that the kind of scandal that's occurred today, the kind of blackmail that we're seeing from the Ford Motor Company, is not allowed to occur in the future.

Hon. B. Stephenson: You're going to scrap the auto pact and destroy 100,000 jobs.

Mr. Cooke: We don't have an auto pact; you're buying them off.

Mr. B. Newman: I rise to make a few comments concerning this debate. Seeing as I do come from the birthplace of the automobile industry in Canada, I am extremely concerned. Likewise, when one looks at the original auto trade pact and reads article 1, section c, which says: "It shall be the policy of each government to avoid actions which would frustrate the achievement of the objective of a fair share of the market"; one would conclude from that that both countries involved would not undertake any type of practices that would be detrimental to one or the other.

Back in February 1978, the present Conservative government, in its meetings with the Prime Minister, signed a communiqué that said the federal and provincial governments would provide incentives and take measures to ensure a proportional share of the increasing investment in the new plant for the automotive industry in Canada, so the decision to provide incentives was made by this government back in February of 1978, quite some time ago.

Hon. B. Stephenson: That doesn't necessarily mean money.

Mr. B. Newman: My own community has been hard hit as a result of rationalization in the auto industry. We had an unemployment index of approximately 12 per cent, almost 12,000 unemployed, in the earlier part of the year. Since then that position has been ameliorated a bit and our unemployment index at this time is approximately 10 per cent. The auto trade pact at this stage has adversely affected the city of Windsor, because all of those jobs or most of their jobs were associated with the auto industry.

Chrysler did develop a van plant in the community, for which we are extremely appreciative. However, by the same token it did remove the six cylinder engine plant, it phased it out and is substituting for that the heavy engines, the 351cc engine if I am not mistaken. What they have done is, the popular engine has disappeared, the jobs that would have been associated with that have disappeared and they have been replaced by a big engine, which will mean fewer jobs and as a result we have some unemployment from the eliminaton of the six cylinder.

Chrysler has also decided that it would remove the truck plant. They are closing out the truck plant completely. There is a loss of some 750 jobs there. Four hundred of those jobs are gone practically permanently. About 350 will be able to be transferred to the van plant if the van plant continues to operate at full capacity, as it is doing right now.

One of the problems with the auto trade pact is there is no uniform data base. When we talk to GM, we find one set of figures; we talk to Ford, we find a second set of figures; we talk to the federal government, we get a third set of figures; we talk to the provincial Treasurer, and we have a fourth set of figures. There is no uniform data base, so we can't compare apples with apples and oranges with oranges. We are having statistics provided by each of the different organizations, governments or companies that cannot be compared one with the other.

We want our fair share. As much as we consume, we want at least that amount of employment in Canada. We want that amount of employment as we produce. I think we do have our fair share when it comes to automobile assembly, but when it comes to the parts manufacturing we are at a disadvantage. I have noticed that the city of Detroit has bid for the retention of the Chrysler plant. They have offered all types of incentives so that they would stay in the city of Detroit. As has been mentioned by previous speakers, the state of Ohio has also done that.

One of the things we are going to have to worry about in the future is that the auto industry can move into the Philippines and will only have to pay five per cent of the wages that they pay in North America. They work in the Philippines for 40 cents an hour, so we are going to have to be extremely concerned that some of these undeveloped countries don't take us right out of the market completely.

Mr. Breugh: Mr. Speaker, I want to take a slightly different view of the automotive situation and the auto pact itself. For one thing, we are drowned in statistics in this. The background paper that was tabled in the House this morning is a succinct document. It's sad but it is succinct. It tells a very sad tale of a sector of our economy, a prominent sector of the economy, that's well on its way down the drain already.

[5:30]

Let me take a very quick overview of what is happening in that industry. I happen to represent a riding that is strongly dominated by a multinational corporation which functions basically in Oshawa and in St. Catharines. We are looking at some old buildings; we understand that there are some options to land developers that have already been exercised and some others that are being considered. We are looking at plants that have used the exemptions provided by this government to put new machinery into their plants, and we fully understand that those exemptions eventually mean a loss of jobs.

We understand, as well, that certain types of operations in parts and service and CKD, a complete knockdown unit, which traditionally has offered a service to the employees as well as to the company—that is, when you can't stand the pace of the production line there are other types of jobs being offered by the company—those types of jobs are sadly diminishing. We are seeing people with 20 and 30 years of seniority being put back into a production line. And, unfortunately, we know that they won't be there for long. They are people with bad backs and bad knees and they won't withstand the pace of the production line for much more than six or eight months and then they will be off on compensation; even though previous to this they would have been able to end their working career profitably and with some satisfaction.

So we see some change in the employment patterns there. We see a buffer that was there for the employees going out the window. We also see a multinational corporation that has its production levels up, at record levels, in fact, but we do see the type of work being restricted and we see the total number of jobs, in effect, being reduced. We can see other examples of this; GM, as an example, at the Hayes-Dana plant in Thorold has gone from 2,500 to 1,500 employees. I guess the most dramatic in the province would have to be Prestolite in Sarnia; once a thriving industry, now virtually out of business.

Those things are in the back of our minds, and we are well aware that in our own local example we have certain types of production which may not be in Oshawa for very much longer. When we look at the federal government, functioning in whatever secretive way it wants, the end result is a good deal of distrust and a fear that we have not only General Motors to battle any more, but also the federal government and maybe another province in our own country. Those are difficult times for us to face in Oshawa.

In Oakville, we see again recurring disputes over overtime; whether we will take the same number of employees and the same production facility and work that thing to the nth degree so that we suffer a loss of jobs, and we also suffer the kind of working conditions that massive amounts of overtime does provide.

In Windsor, we can see 950 employees affected by what is going on in the automotive industry. We can soften that if we want, and of course various people do say that is not really 950 jobs, that is 750 jobs, and that really only 300 jobs will be lost, but we have to take into account that people's employment records are affected by this; some totally, some to a degree, but the same thing happens. What should also be of some concern there is that several small parts vendors will be out of business because production facilities are moved.

In Brampton, in the Premier's own area, I think we see the most dramatic one. I am not sure there is a Big Four any more. There is maybe a Big Three and a Half. We look at American Motors shutting down and changing to production of type of vehicle that is—to be polite about it—very faddy. What do we do when the fad in the American market ends, and people don't want Jeeps like they do now? How many four wheel drive units can this continent hold?

Hon. B. Stephenson: They don't want their cars either.

Mr. Breugh: What will we do with them? Eventually, like the hulahoop, they may not be quite so popular. At that time, unfortunately, we will see our production facilities geared to producing this type of fad. We see it in Windsor, we see it in Brampton, and we see some efforts in the GM production facilities at Oshawa to do the same type of thing, so we will be manufacturing in the Canadian sector things which may not be quite as stable to the industry as ordinary motor vehicles.

We see that loss of jobs, and we see a trend in the industry to see the kind of non-saleable items are produced in Canada. That is unfortunate because in the automotive industry, when we talk about the Canadian automotive industry, basically we are talking about one province, and that happens to be us.

The auto pact itself was written with several corporate advantages in mind. It gave to them an access to the massive market. About 90 per cent of the vehicles we produce in Oshawa go south; and that is not particularly good or bad, but that is particularly of a distinct advantage to the corporation itself. It maximizes the use of facilities, and that is precisely what they have gone about doing.

It is crucial at this point in time, because there is about $60 billion being stuck into the automotive industry in the United States for a variety of reasons. We see specialization. We see more production facilities being located in Canada.

There is virtually no official monitoring of the auto pact itself done in a neutral way. There are virtually no penalties that can be applied to whatever happens in the auto pact. The end result is—in my own area and across Canada—we see less total employment than we had previous to the auto pact. We see a loss of any buffer to employees. We see there are no longer places where employees can do maintenance or service because we have only production facilities. We have really decimated the parts sector, and everyone agrees that about 25,000 jobs have been tossed down the drain in that.

In all of this we see a pretty sad thing. I want to conclude by asking the government to do some concrete things. I plead with the government to bargain with the corporations; don't try to bribe them. It may sound like a great amount of money here; the Treasurer (Mr. McKeough) may be a most impressive minister in this House, large and loud, but in the board rooms of Detroit he couldn't carry the coffee.

Mr. Kerrio: That is unparliamentary.

Mr. Breaugh: I think the most important thing is to get this government to pay some attention to the automotive sector; to make sure it doesn't try to bribe multinational corporations with, in their view, rather small amounts of money. Represent our workers and represent our economy. We think we have convinced this government to be aware of the importance of the automotive industry in Canada. We would now like the government to do something about it.

Mr. Kerrio: Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in the debate as it relates to my particular area of concern, because we certainly have a great many related plants in our area—to get parochial just for the moment in opening—with Ford glass plant and GM in St. Catharines, and Hayes-Dana at Thorold, on the outskirts; and some very large abrasive plants that are I think directly dependent on the industry—Norton, Lionite and Canadian Carborundum—

Mr. Swart: Don't forget Thompson Products.

Mr. Kerrio: —and two or three electrical harness plants in the area.

Mr. Bradley: He only takes the ones with a union.

Mr. Kerrio: Certainly this is of grave concern, in regard to the auto pact, as to how it relates to any new building.

I am just a little disappointed that the member for Chatham-Kent, the Treasurer (Mr. McKeough), got sort of carried away. I thought if there was ever a time in this Legislature where at least the two parties that have come together and thought about how we should entice these plants to come here—

Mr. Cooke: Don't you ever get carried away?

Mr. Mackenzie: Something like you last night, Vince.

Mr. Kerrio: The socialists have taken a stand, and on the short term I don't think we can consider anything coming from them, because right now we are faced with the reality of coming up with funds to bring them here. As long as we are of the same mind, I am very disappointed that the Treasurer got carried away and really lost any kind of—

Mr. Ziembra: They should carry you away.

Mr. Kerrio: —meaningful rapport with us. We should go united to the automotive industries in order to present our case. We should show some kind of solidarity, at least among most of the sensible-thinking people in this Legislature.

Mr. Warner: What a Tory prop. They could all leave and you would apologize for them.

Mr. Kerrio: I say that with respect. I am convinced that in the long term we should be looking for something in the auto pact that would more relate to a fair and equitable involvement, right from the design stage up through the plants that make the cars to the parts industry.

I think the whole auto pact has to be monitored, looked into and revitalized in a way that is going to accommodate the automobile industry to be able to build anywhere in North America and to make it more convenient for them to function. But also we should work for some kind of balance in the auto trade that will see to it that the roughly 10 per cent of the industry that should come to Canada and that part which should come to Ontario would finally end up where it belongs here. It's only going to happen if the Treasurer gets co-operation from enough members on this side to go there in such a way that he can make the best kind of case.

Mr. Mancini: I am pleased to rise to participate in this special debate on the automobile industry. The central issue is whether we shall give direct government incentives to different auto makers, that is, shall the government give huge sums, millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money, so that these auto makers can expand their operations here in the province of Ontario?

This is a very complicated matter. What complicates the matter the most is that one in every six jobs in the province of Ontario is directly or indirectly related to the auto industry. In my own riding, thousands of workers are employed by the auto industry. In 1975, just prior to the provincial election campaign, the Conservative government, which was desperately trying to hang on to power, gave away hundreds of millions of dollars by eliminating the sales tax on new cars sold. At that time, they had no qualms about this large giveaway of the taxpayers' money.

Mr. Nixon: That was a $600 million policy.

Mr. Mancini: But now they are prepared to jeopardize the building of a $500 million plant in the province of Ontario. A plant of this size would mean millions of dollars in tax revenues and thousands of construction jobs, along with 2,600 permanent jobs after the completion of this plant. Even though I deplore this large giveaway, this $37 million we are requested to give to this auto maker, what are we going to do?

Mr. Warner: You will still do it though.

Mr. Mancini: How are we going to control the legislatures of Ohio and Pennsylvania? What answers do the socialists have to that? I say they have no answers at all.

Mr. Cooke: What do we have an auto pact for?

Mr. Mancini: The situation is very plain to see. We are being forced to participate in this bidding war. We are being forced by governments which are outside of our jurisdiction and over which we have no controls.

Mr. Warner: It is a giveaway.

Mr. Cooke: What do we have an auto pact for?

Mr. Mancini: This is a regrettable position. However much we detest the situation, we are going to have to go along with it in the meantime. I say what we should do is give the money and then take the appropriate steps in the immediate future to ensure that this never happens again.

Mr. Warner: You live in an unreal world.

Mr. Mancini: There are many ways this can be done. One of the ways could involve large amounts of these corporate shares being bought by our government.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Which government?

Mr. Mancini: That government over there that never decides to act until it's too late.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: We responded to your great friends in Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Mr. Speaker, I just want to make sure what the honourable member is proposing is on the record, namely, the purchase of shares by the government.

Mr. Mancini: I see that my time is up. I was pleased to have been able to participate.

Mr. Bradley: I rise as a representative of a constituency that relies very heavily on the automotive parts industry for its economic viability. A majority of my neighbours and a very substantial number of the breadwinners in St. Catharines are employed by General Motors, Hayes-Dana Limited and Thompson Products and rely upon the location of plant facilities in the area for their livelihood. For this reason, I feel it is imperative that we in the province of Ontario take any reasonable action necessary to protect the present investment in automotive jobs and to attract all the new investment necessary to improve the employment situation in the province.

Hon. Mr. Welch: You'd better speak to those federal members down there.

Mr. Mancini: There's only one Tory provincial member left.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Note that the Premier is in the House.

Hon. Mr. Davis: They are going to lose their seats.

Mr. Bradley: For some months now, I have been aware of discussions that have taken place surrounding a possible plant expansion by General Motors—

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Note that the Minister of Education (Mr. Wells) is in the House.

Mr. Bradley:—and the fact that the Niagara Peninsula, which is presently experiencing a high rate of unemployment, might not have the same opportunity to attract this new General Motors investment as an area in Canada eligible for grants under the DREE program. To me, this is most disturbing. What is equally disturbing, however, is that at a time when the situation appears to call for a nonpartisan team effort to meet what is a very difficult challenge, we in this House are once again becoming mired in partisan rhetoric.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Only on that side.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Oh, come on. You'd better be careful about that.

Mr. Bradley: As the Premier and the Minister of Industry and Tourism spoke in the House this morning, I detected a sense of grave concern that this most regrettable bidding war was being lost because of lack of ammunition available to this province.

[5:45]

Hon. Mr. Welch: The federal member for Niagara Falls has done nothing. I said the federal member for Niagara Falls.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am liable to quote what you said earlier.

Mr. Bradley: Without exception, members of the Legislature find the necessity to offer giant corporations large financial incentives to locate in specific areas—a repulsive, distasteful development.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Don't believe everything Harold writes for you.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Harold is a little out of his depth on this issue.

Mr. Bradley: But it is being done, not only by our neighbours to the south but also by our sister provinces and the federal government.

Hon. Mr. Welch: The federal member for St. Catharines didn't even know who the minister was.

Mr. Bradley: In the absence of any ironclad agreement on the part of the various political jurisdictions to avoid a bidding war, we find ourselves faced with the reality of stiff opposition and the possibility that we will not reap the benefit of the new investment.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Jimmy, you've got to read faster.

Mr. Bradley: What all members in the House surely agree upon is that if the federal government feels compelled to enter into the financial incentives battle, we in this province should be offered an equal opportunity to compete for the new jobs.

The danger for my riding in any future expansion plans lies in the new technical developments that could eliminate jobs—

Hon. Mr. Welch: And the riding of Brock.

Mr. Bradley:—in St. Catharines and Brock. If a new aluminum engine plant is located in the United States, or in another Canadian locality, what will be the effect on the foundry in St. Catharines, which uses grey and malleable steel products? If there's a movement to front-end drive vehicles, as scheduled for 1981, what will happen to the jobs in the GM rear-axle division?

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Good question.

Mr. Foulds: Spineless Stuart Smith sold out.

Mr. Bradley: These are questions the workers of my constituency might legitimately ask.

Hon. Mr. Welch: And they should ask the federal members down there.

Mr. Bradley: A good deal of the problem lies in the provisions of the auto pact as they relate to the parts division of the auto industry. The belated Reisman investigation may produce some results but they will not be useful to us in the present situation.

I find it unfortunate that the Treasurer, after presenting the problems and options in a reasoned, forthright manner, chose to conclude his excellent speech with some unfortunate partisan invective. We are not completely united in this House on the precise method of meeting a very crucial situation.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: We are united in this party.

Mr. Bradley: However, we are united in our concern and our desire to get our fair share of auto plant expansion. Let us not allow this issue, at this point, to deteriorate into a political, partisan wrangle.

Hon. Mr. Bennett: Okay, Jack Horner.

Hon. Mr. Welch: You've had two or three months to do something.

Mr. Bradley: Let us, as members of this House, support any efforts that the Premier feels are necessary, any efforts that the Minister of Industry and Tourism feels are necessary, to bring the necessary plant expansion to here in Ontario. All we ask for is our fair share. We in this Legislature are united in that goal.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, we may be united in attempting to get a fair share of the auto industry wealth for Ontario—

Hon. Mr. Welch: Dispense.

Mr. Ruston: Take it as read.

Mr. Deans: Thank you very much—the jobs and all of the other benefits, but we're not united in the method that should be used.

This morning, when the matter was raised, I said to the Premier that this is robbery and we're being ripped off and, in fact, we are. I want to say again to him that we can't create economic stability with giveaways; we can't create long-term employment for the province with giveaways, and we can't afford to begin now or to continue this ridiculous bidding war that the government is starting.

Hon. Mr. Davis: You're quite right. Nationalize the automotive industry and we will all be out of work.

Hon. B. Stephenson: We didn't start it.

Mr. Nixon: Let's move to increase the time limit on this debate.

Mr. Deans: Okay. Let's have a look at it, because, let me tell you—

Mr. Kerrio: Are you going to nationalize General Motors?

Mr. Mackenzie: Do you only know how to follow the Tories, Vince?

Mr. Deans: I sat so quietly, listening to—

Mr. Speaker: The previous speaker did an excellent job of just ignoring the interjections.

Mr. Deans: There were no interjections.

I want to suggest to the government that we simply can't begin this bidding war. It's a never-ending, downhill, careening problem that we're going to be faced with time after time.

Mr. Kerrio: It's already happened; you're too late.

Mr. Deans: What do we do when Westinghouse knock on our door and tell us that unless we provide them with money they are going to go back to the United States? Or when General Electric come and tell us likewise? Or when General Motors come and say that if we don't provide them with some kind of subsidy, off they go? Or when American Motors, in the Premier's own home town, come and say that they've got a problem and if we don't give them money, they're going to move to some other part of the world. Or if Peugeot come in and say they'd like some money from Ontario? Or perhaps Datsun will tell us it's always better if we own a Datsun; therefore, we should provide them with Ontario tax dollars in order to get some favour.

If this was one of these poor operations that couldn't afford to withstand the necessary capital investment out of its own income capacities, then I would say to the Premier that we might take a look at it. Maybe we should look at taking an equity position to guarantee that there will be some return to the people of Ontario. But we're talking about a different kind of company.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Ian, the greatest mistake your party made was not making you leader.

Mr. Deans: We are talking about a different kind of company; and let me just say to you, since I don't have a lot of time; we are talking about a company that has wealth beyond belief, a company capable of creating here in Ontario and in Canada sufficient wealth to enable it to reinvest, that makes quite clearly by the record on an earnings per common share here in Canada substantially more than it is able to make in the United States on the same product.

This is a company that in the last five years has made $568 million of net profit after taxes here in Canada. In 1977 its earnings per common share in Canada was $4.43, the lowest in the last decade. In 1976 the earnings in Canada were $15.21, in the States $10.45. In 1975 the earnings were $14.45, in the States $2.44. The earnings in Canada in 1974 were $18.60; were $3.86 in the United States. But if you go back to 1972 the earnings in Canada were $15.77 per common share, only $8.52 in the United States.

Mr. Nixon: Slower, I am taking notes.

Mr. Deans: What in heaven's name are we doing trying to bribe a company to come in here, where they can make earnings far in excess of those that they can make in any other part of the world?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I don't think you should ask heaven to make these determinations.

Mr. Deans: What are we saying? That we have to not only give them the benefit of all these substantial gross earnings for their own use while in the United States, where you tell me they are going to go and where they are not going to make more than one third of the earnings there that they are able to make here in Canada—

Mr. Martel: They want the bank.

Mr. Deans: —that they want us not only to provide a climate that we have provided—

Mr. Mackenzie: They know where the suckers are, Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. Deans: —a climate for making the kind of money that they have been able to make here over and against what they were able to make in the US, but that they want us now to dig into the treasury and provide them with handouts?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Tell your colleagues.

Mr. Deans: Well, I want to tell you something. You can't win in this game. We are not big enough to win in this game. If we try to take on the United States in terms of giveaways, we are bound to lose.

Mr. Kerrio: We did it before, Ian.

Mr. Deans: But the end result of all of this will be that after they have drained us dry, as they have over the years, they will then turn around and they will move anyway; and you know, as I know, that by far the vast majority of the dollars that will be invested in Canada will not in fact create a net increase in the numbers of jobs.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Your policy has changed; read the note.

Mr. Deans: No, my policy hasn't changed. My policy is exactly the same, and what I am saying to you is this:—

Hon. Mr. Welch: You sound like a socialist.

Mr. Deans: This is not an appropriate step to take. If there were any justification at all—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, listen: You have advocated incentives. Look at Hansard.

Mr. Deans: —for being involved in any way in providing capital for the Ford Motor Company to locate anything in Ontario, for heaven's sake, do it on an equity basis. If the government is determined that—

Hon. B. Stephenson: But your leader in March suggested that we should.

Mr. Deans: —we should involve the capital, the tax dollars of the public of the province of Ontario in any corporate undertaking, for goodness sake make sure that there is a rate of return to us from that investment that will justify the investment. That's good government. That's even good Tory government.

Mr. Speaker: The honourable Premier.

Mr. Martel: The last hurrah!

Hon. Mr. Davis: I will be here in October.
Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, they are interrupting me.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The members opposite will be glad they waited.

Interjections.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I will try in these very few minutes left to put this total issue in perspective so we will all understand it.

Mr. Martel: Are you ever lucky. Always the spotlight on you. That is called the un-biased press.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That tells you something.

Hon. B. Stephenson: No, no. It is that heavenly glow.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Let Hansard show the lights went on.

Hon. Mr. Davis: As I listened to the discussions I have come to one or two conclusions: first, that some members aren't totally aware of the entire problem; second, that the New Democrats really aren't too sure where they are on this issue. The Liberal Party of Ontario wants to be all things to all people again and wishes to give away the store in the process;—

Mr. Cooke: It's your party that flip-flopped.

Hon. Mr. Davis: —that much I've learned in this brief debate.

Mr. Martel: More crud.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I want to make just one personal observation to the member for Oshawa. He talked about a riding about which I know somewhat. If he wants to say to the people who are members of the UAW in my community that American Motors made a mistake in introducing the Jeep into that community he should go out and talk to those fellows, because some of them will disagree with him.

Mr. Breaugh: All right; fair enough.

Hon. Mr. Davis: That decision—I am speaking now in a very parochial sense—may add a degree of stability to American Motors in our community that has not existed to the same extent in the past few years.

Mr. Breaugh: Tell me that three years from now.

Mr. Mackenzie: I wonder if it will be like Northern Telecom?

Hon. Mr. Davis: All right, he can knock it, he can say it's wrong; but I've got to tell him some of his own colleagues in the UAW think it's not such a bad arrangement.

Mr. Mackenzie: Tell us about Northern Telecom.

Mr. Breaugh: What choice did they have?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I would say to the member for Oshawa that this is probably a better solution than the one that presently exists. If he knocks it, be my guest; all it means is that I get a few more votes from his colleagues in the UAW in my community. I appreciate it very much.

I also want to say this: I regret the leader of the New Democratic Party isn't here, but I listened to his rhetoric and I listened to the distinguished member who should have been leader in his last few remarks. I can only say you people can't have it both ways. You can't have the member for Nickel Belt saying to the Minister of Industry and Tourism; "When are you going to get into the game in incentives?" and the implied observation was very simply this—

Mr. Foulds: He didn't say that.

Mr. Martel: He didn't say that.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Do the members want me to read it to them? If they want me to read it to them I will read it to them very simply.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: This should be interesting.

Hon. Mr. Davis: "Supplementary: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there are as many as 25,000 jobs, $866 million worth of investment at stake"—where he got this from, I don't know—"in these negotiations, doesn't the minister think it is time the province of Ontario got off the sidelines and into the game?" There is only one implication—

Mr. Foulds: What nonsense.

Mr. Martel: Boy oh boy, are you reaching. You are scraping the bottom of the barrel.

Hon. Mr. Davis:—the member for Nickel Belt wants to put the government into the auto business. Certainly he does, as does the member for Windsor-Walkerville.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: How else would you interpret it?

Hon. Mr. Davis: What did Michael Cassidy say? What did Brother Cassidy say? Did he say whether Ontario has made any specific initiatives to counter the apparently lucrative offers from the states in the United States? What does he mean by that? Of course, he means incentives. You know, somebody told him, "The party line has got to change," and you guys came in and as a result you don't deal with reality.

Hon. Mr. Welch: I think you're getting to them.

Mr. Foulds: Initiatives. Initiatives. Does that mean give away the store? Nonsense.

Mr. Martel: This is the lowest of the low. Boy. Initiatives are now subsidies and giveaways. Bull roar.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Oh, come on. You guys love to whistle and blow at the same time. You've been doing it all of your political careers, and you are not going to get away with it. I'm glad the member for Nickel Belt is here. See what he said earlier.

Mr. Martel: The phrase is "suck and blow."

An hon. member: The Premier's time is up.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, I've got 37 seconds left. Mr. Speaker, can I just really sum up?

This government is not enthusiastic about the incentive game. We are faced with a particular problem as it relates to one particular plant at this moment. I have read the letter that the Leader of the Opposition has sent to his very close friend and personal associate, the Prime Minister of this country; very close friend. They are the people who have helped complicate this issue at this precise moment. There is no way the federal minister can say one day it is 75-25, and then we find the upper limitation is $37 million. That's not the way to do business, and those people across the floor have to assume some responsibility because of their very close association with them.

Mr. S. Smith: What nonsense, what nonsense. They don't ask us, for God's sake. If they would ask us we would tell them how to govern. They ask you more than they ask us.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Oh, come on. Listen, the leader of the opposition and Pierre are so close they are like twins. What I haven't found over there yet is a comparable person to Jack Horner. That hasn't really occurred to me yet.

Hon. Mr. Welch: There's only one Horner.

Hon. Mr. Norton: Speak to your buddy Jack Horner, Stuart.

Mr. Martel: You do need a vacation. He needs a vacation, I want to tell you.

Mr. Foulds: Don't get your hair ruffled, Bill; run your hands through it.

Hon. Mr. Davis: This government has taken a constructive and positive attitude to this problem. We are attempting through our dealings with the industry to see that we get our fair share of investment. The government of Canada put $30 million on the table with respect to Ford; we are prepared, and I won't back away from it—

[6:00]

Mr. Foulds: Where is the Treasurer?

Hon. Mr. Welch: He is writing a cheque.

Mr. Martel: He is writing a cheque for $30 million.

Hon. Mr. Davis: We are prepared to involve ourselves in the 75-25 program, but it has to have application right across the board and not just for one particular industry, not just particularly for the Ford Motor Company. We have made this position very clear to the government of Canada.

Mr. Cassidy: Are you justifying this kind of corporate welfare? Is the Treasurer writing the cheque right now?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I see the member for St. Catharines is nodding his head in agreement because we're helping to bail him out of an inactivity on the part of the federal government in his riding, and he well knows it.

Hon. Mr. Welch: That's right, because the federal members down there have done nothing.

Mr. S. Smith: And you think you will get a majority?

Mr. Cassidy: You will hear a lot more about this.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I'm delighted with this debate, but I've got to tell you, Mr. Speaker, it isn't finished. I'm not concerned about majorities. I'm concerned about offering good government to the people of this province. I don't let my own personal ego interfere—

Mr. S. Smith: It's the language issue, isn't it?

Hon. Mr. Davis: —with that responsibility, which is something that the Leader of the Opposition should learn.

Hon. W. Newman: What he is saying is you should put yourself on the couch.

Mr. Foulds: Time.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The problem of the Leader of the Opposition is that he's beginning to believe some of his own press clippings. That's a fundamental error. He should never make that mistake.

Mr. S. Smith: You're reading them pretty carefully these days, aren't you?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I'm not debating language here today.

Mr. Martel: You are not debating anything.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Just go across this province—and I notice you haven't done it making whatever observations you want to make in the field of language. I can only say to the Leader of the Opposition to do so. Go ahead.

Mr. Sweeney: You're using the situation for political purposes.

Hon. Mr. Davis: But I should caution him, let's do it in a non-partisan sense, which he has not done to date.

Hon. W. Newman: Sock it to him.

Hon. Mr. Davis: It is now 6 o'clock. Could I say in final conclusion that I appreciate the observations of the members opposite. Before I sit down and before the House leader moves the adjournment of the debate, may I extend to all members opposite my sincere appreciation for their co-operation on many issues, their limited co-operation on some issues—

Mr. Deans: Jesus.

Hon. Mr. Davis: —and wish them all a very pleasant vacation. We will see them here again in October.

Mr. Foulds: I don't believe it.

Mr. Sweeney: You need a recess. You need a vacation after that.

Hon. Mr. Davis: For three minutes what do you do? You take 10 minutes and you still don't get warmed up.

Hon. Mr. Welch: The Premier put the issue right on the record for the peninsula, and he did it very well. Those four federal Liberals in the Niagara Peninsula will be shivering tonight—shuddering tonight. There's no doubt about it.

Mr. Nixon: Will you pull yourself together, for God's sake?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would like to wish all members a very peaceful, harmonious, contented summer recess. When we reconvene in the fall, perhaps you'll be a little bit more generous and a little less intemperate.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, are you referring to beer in the ball park?

Mr. Laughren: A by-election in Brampton.

On motion by Hon. Mr. Welch, the House adjourned at 6:05 p.m. until a date to be named by the Lieutenant Governor by her proclamation.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON NOTICE PAPER

BUSINESS MACHINES

22. Mr. B. Wildman (Algoma): Would the ministry indicate to the House the number and value of business machines—including typewriters, calculators, dictaphones, word processing systems, addressing systems, printing systems and computers—that have been purchased and/or leased by the government of Ontario over the last three years? Would the ministry list these purchases and/or leases by company and product, and indicate whether or not these machines have been fully manufactured in Canada? [Tabled March 31, 1978; interim answer tabled April 10, 1978.]

Hon. L. C. Henderson (Minister of Government Services): The answer to this question has required the gathering of a large volume of detailed information from various ministries and has taken a considerable amount of time to compile. Most of the information has been obtained concerning the number and value of business machines. However, due to the detailed nature of this information it is suggested that the answer, to the extent that the information can be obtained, will be forwarded direct to the member by the minister's office within the next few days.

PUBLIC OPINION POLLS

29. Mr. T. P. Reid (Rainy River): Would the ministry provide the titles and subject matter of all public opinion polls for each government ministry, the cost of each poll, and the name of the company which conducted the poll from January 1, 1975, until April 1, 1978? Would the ministry table copies of each such opinion poll? [Tabled April 13, 1978.]

Hon. J. A. Auld (Chairman, Management Board of Cabinet): The information requested on opinion polls for the period January 1, 1975, to April 1, 1978, is attached. The polls in question constitute working documents for the development of policy and it is not the practice of the government to release material of this nature.

MERCURY CONTAMINATION

33. Mr. J. F. Foulds (Port Arthur): When, if ever, is the ministry going to close the English-Wabigoon River system to sport fishing? What studies, if any, have been done by the ministry about the impact of such a closure? Would the ministry table all such studies? What discussions and/or correspondence have taken place between the provincial and federal government, especially since June 1975 with a view to closing the English-Wabigoon River system to sports fishing? Would the ministry table any minutes or correspondence on this subject matter? [Tabled April 18, 1978; interim answer tabled May 1, 1978.]

Hon. F. S. Miller: (Minister of Natural Resources): The government has stated on numerous occasions that it does not intend to close the English-Wabigoon River system to sport fishing. We have rejected this suggestion as being superficial, simplistic and a procedure which would not accomplish anything of real significance. The banning of sport fishing on this system would not only be unenforceable, it would not necessarily provide any real protection to the health of Indians on the Grassy Narrows and Whitedog reserves.

Conversely, it would force the closing of local commercial enterprises such as tourist lodges and decrease employment opportunities.

When the federal government suggested that a national park in the area was being reviewed, data were developed as to the potential impact of a closure. The direct loss in revenue from closure of sport fishing was estimated to be in excess of $2 million annually. The associated loss of tourism in northern Ontario was put at $43 million. The cost of purchasing all lodges on the system was estimated at between $6 million to $12 million, although it was recognized that any system of compensation would have to allow operators the option of relocating or remaining in a position to reopen should this prove possible. Closure would result in the loss of some 300 jobs, including those of 46 Indian guides. A copy of the data developed for this analysis is attached.

The subject of closure was discussed on several occasions at meetings of the federal provincial co-ordinating committee dealing with mercury and the English-Wabigoon River system. The committee is made up of officials from several ministries and departments from both governments as well as representatives of the Indians.

ALUMINUM WIRING

44. Mr. D. Warner (Scarborough-Ellesmere): Since a commitment was made on December 16, 1977, by the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations to complete the report on the aluminum wiring inquiry and so inform the Legislative Assembly no later than April 30, 1978, will the minister explain: 1. why the date was not complied with, and 2. the exact date when the report will be tabled? [Tabled May 1, 1978.]

Hon. L. Grossman (Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations): Further to the interim reply on May 15, 1978 the minister has discussed the matter with Dr. Tuzo Wilson*.

Following the conclusion of the public hearings, the commission determined that it required additional technical expertise to complete its comprehensive review of the subject. The report will be available shortly.

PODIATRY

104. Mr. M. Breaugh (Oshawa): Would the Ministry of Health indicate its official position towards the practice of podiatry in this province? As the Chiropody Act does not make clear the role of podiatrists, as compared to chiropodists, in the provision of foot care, would the ministry make clear the similarities and differences it sees in the services provided by these health professionals? Is there consideration being given to covering podiatry under the College of Physicians and Surgeons or the Health Disciplines Act? Are they being considered for services under OHIP? [Tabled June 14, 1978.]

Hon. D. R. Timbrell (Minister of Health): Our response to the above question reads as follows:

The practice of podiatry is not defined in Ontario Legislation. Podiatrists are registered under the Chiropody Act and the practice is defined as:

Section 6(3), chapter 70: "4. Nothing in this Act or the regulations authorizes a chiropodist, (a) to administer a drug internally or to prescribe a drug for use internally; (b) to administer an anaesthetic other than a substance applied externally to the skin; or (c) to practise medicine, surgery or mid-wifery, but nothing in this Act or the regulations prevents the treatment by a registered chiropodist of morbid conditions of the nails and skin and the resulting minor morbid conditions of the subcutaneous tissues of the human foot. RSO 1960, c. 57, s. 4".

Section 3(c), chapter 70: "1. (b) 'chiropodist' means a person, other than a legally qualified medical practitioner, who practises or advertises or holds himself out in any way as practising the the treatment of any ailment, disease, defect or disability of the human foot."

Podiatrists, supported by a court decision, have interpreted the definition to include some surgery.

The regulations made under the Chiropody Act require that registrants under the Act are graduates of US-based schools of podiatry or hold equivalent qualifications. Graduates from other jurisdictions are not eligible for registration without further training and qualifications.

Chiropody is a term used to describe the care of the feet, which is limited to treatment by cutting or scrapping to the integument of the foot, and non-surgical treatment with appliances, i.e., light, heat, water or electrotherapy. Topical preparation drugs, anesthetics and x-rays are used either not at all, or to a very limited extent.

Podiatry is a term used to describe foot care which includes surgery, i.e., x-rays and the use of drugs and anesthetics.

A discussion paper on Foot Care Services in Ontario was issued in August 1977. Responses have been received and reviewed. A foot care service policy paper will be released shortly. The policy will cover the utilization of those qualified as podiatrists in the delivery of these services.

Chiropodists services are now specified as an insured service under the health insurance plan to a maximum of $100 per person in a 12 month period excluding radiographic examinations.

ANAESTHETISTS

105. Mr. Breaugh: Would the Ministry of Health provide statistics as to the number of anaesthetists, by hospital in Metropolitan Toronto, (a) who are accepting payment directly from OHIP, and (b) who have opted out of OHIP? Also, would the ministry provide similar information compiled on a regional basis throughout Ontario? [Tabled June 14, 1978.]

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Our response to the above question reads as follows:

It is not possible in the given time frame to provide this information on a "by hospital" basis. Also, that such information on a "by hospital" basis would distort the manpower position because anaesthetists commonly have appointments to more than one hospital.

Therefore, we are presenting the number of anaesthetists by county/district within the six health regions in the province.

OHIP BILLINGS

106. Mr. Breaugh: Would the Ministry of Health provide the following statistics: (a) the number of units of service performed in 1977 by doctors for which the doctors billed OHIP directly; (b) the number of units of service performed by doctors, payment for which was sent to individual subscribers of OHIP; (c) the number of units charged under Workmen's Compensation Board rates; and (d) the number of units charged over the Ontario Medical Association Schedule? [Tabled June 14, 1978.]

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Our response to the above question reads as follows:

Statistics that show the number of services performed by all "bill plan" and "bill patient" physicians during the most recent 12 service months available are for the period of November 1976 to October 1977. It shows that of 101,203,900 units of service performed, 94,643,000 or 93.5 per cent were billed to the plan and 6,560,900 or 6.5 per cent were billed to the patient.

No data is available to provide the number of units of service billed over the OMA schedule of fees.

Hon. B. Stephenson (Minister of Labour):
(c) The Workmen's Compensation Board does not identify the "units" of service but rather the number of "doctors" and the number of "invoices." Most "invoices" contain an average of three to five items.

The number of doctors who submitted "invoices" to the board in 1977 was 7,268, with a total number of invoices of 706,250. It is therefore estimated that in 1977 there was a total of 2,825,000 "units."

PSYCHIATRIC INSTITUTIONS

107. Mr. Breugh: Would the Ministry of Health provide the following information concerning involuntary admissions to psychiatric institutions in 1977; where; number of re-admissions; average length of stay; reasons stated for involuntary admission? [Tabled June 14, 1978.]

Hon. Mr. Timbrell: Our response to question 107 is as follows:

Where	No. of Readmissions
North Bay	163
Kingston	136
London	221
Brockville	145
St. Thomas	190
Queen Street	263
Lakeshore	207
Whitby	171
Lakehead	134
Hamilton	200
Penetanguishene	119

The average length of stay (involuntary), for 1977 was 54.2 days.

As the reason for involuntary admission per se fringes upon the confidentiality of patients' records would the member be more specific as to what he would like to know about admissions? Compiling this information would be very lengthy and the reasons innumerable.

CHARTER OF ONR TRAIN

110. Mr. Wildman: Was a special ONR train chartered to travel from Timmins to Iroquois Falls, return, on June 8, 1977? If so, who was the client(s) who chartered the train? How much did ONR bill the client(s) for this charter? How many ONR employees worked on this charter run? How much of the cost of the charter train resulted from overtime pay for employees of this train? How many passengers travelled on the train? What was the total bill for food and beverage refreshments on the trip? [Tabled June 16, 1978.]

Hon. L. Bernier (Minister of Northern Affairs): Yes, a special train was chartered. The client was Mr. G. Spooner, PO Box 130, Timmins, Ontario. He was charged $2,500 for the charter. There was a crew of five on the train; no overtime pay was required. There was sufficient accommodation for approximately 480 passengers. There was no dining car and therefore no bill for either food or beverage refreshments.

Please provide a breakdown by electoral district showing the number of students in the program from each such district, as is done for the Junior Ranger program [Tabled June 22, 1978.]

Hon. M. Birch (Provincial Secretary for Social Development): The number of students hired this year under the Ontario Experience '78 program is 13,500. Students are not hired by electoral district but by ministry program.

RESPONSE TO PETITION TENANT PROTECTION

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I wish to respond to the following petition:

"In keeping with section 83 of the standing orders of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario, I am petitioning the Lieutenant Governor and the Legislative Assembly:

"Since it will not be possible for legislation to be drafted, introduced, given adequate discussion, and passed between the June 15, 1978, reporting date of the standing general government committee and the deadline of the end of September 1978, which must be met for legislation to take effect on January 1, 1979, that the present rent review legislation be extended for at least six months as an interim measure."

The petition is on behalf of, and signed by Dr. Jan Duksza, MPP, Parkdale.

Further to the interim answer of June 5, 1978, the minister reviewed the report of the standing general government committee. He introduced Bill 124, An Act to amend the Residential Premises Rent Review Act, on Friday, June 16. Bill 124 received third reading on June 22.
